John Robertson: No. [Laughter.] Having said that, I think the information may be further on in my speech. It is, so I am being a bit cheeky. I shall come to that suggestion.

Although the debate seems to have turned into a debate about nuclear energy, I am trying to tell Opposition Members and my hon. Friends on the Government Benches that the Select Committee report is not about nuclear energy; it is about a sustainable energy policy for the needs of Scotland. We—apart from two Members—thought that nothing should be excluded. That was sensible, and it is probably why the report has been well received in several quarters, and not only the nuclear lobbies. Other lobbies consider it balanced, and I commend everybody who took part and who gave evidence to the Committee.

There has been a mad dash down the wind farm route. Many Members have mentioned that, and I am sure that many Opposition Members shall mention it. At the moment, we cannot make wind farms work effectively. I am being generous, but wind power is intermittent at best and will be only about 30 per cent. effective. There are a substantial number of wind farms, and an audit is under way to establish their contribution. It would be beneficial if we assessed their value and obtained the figures.

Mark Lazarowicz: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again, given the number of interventions he has taken. No one suggests that wind energy can meet all the energy needs of Scotland or anywhere else, but on the question of wind energy should he not bear in mind the latest figures from the Department of Trade and Industry, which suggest that the cost for onshore wind is now significantly lower than that for new nuclear build? The projection for offshore wind is that its cost, too, could fall below that of nuclear by 2020.

May I suggest to my hon. Friend that the report is a little too critical of the possibility of renewable energy, which it describes as somewhat uncertain? That contrasts with its description of nuclear fusion as a possible major source of power in the not-too-distant future, which is somewhat optimistic to say the least.

John Robertson: It all depends on what my hon. Friend means. If 30 or 40 years is in the distant future, that possibility is in the distant future. However, we have a short time in which to secure the world's climate, so we may not be able to wait for fusion. Costs move all the time, and I shall come on to them. I accept what he says, because I do not have the figures to hand. I am happy to receive them, if he wishes to send them to me.

I am aware that other Members want to speak and I am trying to cut out parts of my speech, but I want to mention the Royal Academy of Engineering. It conducted an excellent study of price comparisons, and nuclear energy came out favourably. Renewables cost approximately double, and there were concerns about safety. The nuclear industry has some of the highest safety standards in the world. We should continue to ensure that there are supplies worldwide.

More than 30 new reactors have been built. Russia is building nuclear power plants in order to sell its gas and oil to us. I wonder why. Finland, rather than depend on its neighbour Russia for gas, is building its fifth nuclear power plant. China has built six of which I know, and many more are being built. France, our near neighbour, depends on nuclear energy for more than 70 per cent. of its energy. I am aware that none of these arguments will change the minds of the energy troglodytes today, but we must try to educate them.

Our energy policy should not become subject to party politics; it is much too important for that. We need to develop an agreed energy policy framework, and it should have cross-party support. Unfortunately, the Liberals and the Scottish National party will continue to endanger the future energy policy of the country. Their rejection of the nuclear option would mean dependence on imported gas for the bulk of our energy needs. They will argue for other forms of energy, knowing that their policies are simply a leap in the dark because those forms of energy currently represent neither a core source nor a proven technology on the scale we require to maintain our security.

Sweden voted to phase out its nuclear industry some 25 years ago. It now recognises the folly of that decision. It found that the alternatives were not as cost-effective as it first thought, and it is now Europe's third largest consumer of nuclear-generated energy.

This week, it was reported on Teletext that Ofgem had asked for an inquiry into why the rest of the European Union is not selling more gas to Britain, when prices have been so high. We should remember that when we start talking about importing gas from places such as Russia and the middle east, and about a pipeline that crosses the whole of Europe. There have been claims that rules in other EU countries mean that gas held in storage is not released for export. According to the BBC, Ofgem has asked the European Commission for an investigation into the recent high prices.

Mr. Carmichael: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. Please can he explain this to me: if Russia is such an unstable nation that we should not buy our gas from it, why is it stable enough to be trusted with nuclear power stations?

John Robertson: The hon. Gentleman knows that the Russians have their own technology and have built their nuclear power stations themselves. It would have been very difficult to stop them doing so, particularly as Russia used to be one of the most powerful countries in the world, but that is not to say that I would not have liked to have done that.

I want to move on to green matters. We must listen to those who, because of the current serious situation, have converted and become supporters of nuclear energy. An article in The Sunday Times reported the comments of Professor James Lovelock—a pal of my hon. Friend the

[John Robertson]

Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith. He gave evidence to the Committee, and he has impeccable credentials as an environmentalist and a scientist.

Several hon. Members rose—

John Robertson: I will not give way.

Professor Lovelock described global warming as "the greatest test humanity has ever had",

and he called for a nuclear programme

"whose scale dwarfs the space and military programmes".

He also said:

"I find it extraordinary that the one safe and proven energy source that has minimal global consequences, nuclear power, is so readily rejected."

The same article reported that Hugh Montefiore, former Bishop of Birmingham, had quit the board of Friends of the Earth after coming out in favour of nuclear power. He said:

"I have concluded that the solution is to make more use of nuclear energy."

The report also referred to Sir John Houghton, a well known and respected scientist and former head of the Met Office. He said nuclear power is "increasingly attractive".

I recognise that environmentalists are used to scientists suggesting that more technology can solve such problems, but I believe that they were shocked when Peter Harper and Paul Allen, leading green thinkers from the Centre for Alternative Technology, made a similar suggestion.

If we are serious about solving the problem of our CO_2 emissions and ensuring security of supply—if we want to avoid the lights going out—we must be bold and have a serious debate to find the best solution to the energy problems we might face in the near future.

3.25 pm

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): I am delighted to contribute to this discussion about a tremendously important issue for the future of Scotland. The debate on how to meet our future energy needs clearly provokes strong opinions on both sides of the Chamber. However, I believe that there are a number of issues on which we can all agree: our declining gas reserves; the fact that, if current trends continue, the country will miss its targets on lowering carbon emissions; and the absence of a "silver bullet"—as the Committee put it—to solve our energy needs.

We all seem to agree on the problems, but there are different opinions on how best to deal with these truths. In that regard, I have several real concerns about the Committee's findings and recommendations.

I agree with several of the Committee's recommendations. One, which I hope that the Minister can discuss, relates to the importance of the Scottish Executive clarifying their position on whether the target of 40 per cent. renewables by 2020 relates to generation or consumption. Assuming that Scotland remains a net exporter of electricity, a target of 40 per cent. of generation would be much higher than a target of 40 per cent. of consumption, and vice versa if Scotland becomes a net importer. Clarification would be most welcome.

I am also pleased that the Committee recognised the importance of improving energy efficiency, which is the best way of ensuring that our energy supply is maintained while helping to cut CO_2 emissions. It is also far more cost-effective than investing billions of pounds in new nuclear power stations.

I join the Committee in commending the good work of the Energy Saving Trust and its energy efficiency campaign. Indeed, it helped me cut carbon emissions in my constituency office by recommending a change in heating system. However, the real challenge is to convince people that they really can make a difference. Energy saving on a national scale is vital, and the potential benefits are enormous. I hope that the Government will wake up to the vast opportunities in that regard.

However, there are problems with the report. Although the Committee has made several positive recommendations, I have a number of real concerns. First, I simply do not see the need for another energy audit. There has already been an extensive review of the UK's renewable energy resources, and the state of our gas and coal reserves is well documented. What is needed is an energy policy and mechanisms that allow it to be implemented in a privatised electricity supply industry. Decisions such as the likely Scottish Power closures at Longannet and Cockenzie show how little control the Government and the Scottish Executive have over major decisions about Scotland's generating capacity.

As the report states, no single form of energy production is perfect, but some are less perfect than others. I am sure that I am not alone in my disappointment at the way in which the report seems to rule out the long-term prospects for renewable energy, only to use that as a de facto reason for supporting a return to nuclear power. Clearly, we will face extremely difficult questions on energy generation, but nuclear power is not the answer to any of them.

Although I agree with the Committee that it might be sensible not to rely on emerging renewables for a quarter of the renewables supply, the evidence from the Scottish Renewables Forum was indicative, and renewables technologies are clearly reasonable as an aspiration. Only by encouraging them will we ascertain their economic potential.

Furthermore, while reports of the development of nuclear fusion are certainly interesting, the Committee admits that the prospect of a new generation of nuclear power stations is still a long way down the line. Indeed, it feels as though nuclear fusion has been 10 to 30 years off for the past 50 years.

David Mundell: Can the hon. Gentleman clarify one point? Should the Liberal Democrats be in the Scottish Executive when the UK Government determine to follow a nuclear energy policy, will they accept that legitimate decision given the constitutional settlement?

John Barrett: I clearly look forward to a time when the Liberal Democrats are the majority party in the Scottish Executive and perhaps form part of the Government at Westminster, so the scenario that the hon. Gentleman paints is unlikely to unfold.

Mr. Hood: Perhaps I have missed it, but is there a new technology in the Liberal party's thinking? Is it the technology of aspiration? What percentage of Scotland's energy generation will aspiration generation meet?

John Barrett: I did not quite understand the question, to be perfectly honest. It is perfectly reasonable to have the aspiration that renewables will account for an increased percentage of power generation in the long term.

John Robertson: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can tell me what will turn on the lights when those renewables do not supply the electricity? Aspirations?

John Barrett: We are looking for a mix of electricity generation, and that can be provided in the long term without a nuclear component. With that in mind, it is strange that the long-term nature of the next generation of renewables seems to rule them out as a viable major energy source, while the equally long-term next generation of nuclear power stations is held up as something of an energy holy grail.

That bias towards nuclear energy permeates many areas of the report; perhaps it could have been avoided if the Committee had not leaned so heavily on the opinions of pro-nuclear experts. For example, the report makes extensive use of the evidence of Professor Lovelock, who is quoted four times and is the most referenced expert in the report. It should be noticed that his views on the nuclear industry are not shared by all, and certainly not by the vast majority of the environment movement.

Mr. Weir: In his speech, the hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson) cited Professor Lovelock as a new adherent of nuclear power. Has he read the evidence given by Professor Lovelock on 22 February 2005? When asked why he came to be a nuclearphile, the professor said:

"It is a view I have held for the last 25 years, at least. It is on record in a book I wrote in 1985."

Strangely enough, he was answering the hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West.

John Barrett: That statement comes as no surprise to me; I shall add to that.

John Robertson: On a point of information, Mr. Amess. The gentleman was 83 years old; that might have something to do with the fact that he was in the Green party for 30 years.

John Barrett: Well, one of the important points made by Professor Lovelock referred to the storage of high-level nuclear waste under the floor of his house to provide heat and sterilise food. His Gummer-like decision to offer to have his grandchildren sit on top of nuclear waste to have their photograph taken also sticks in the memory. Needless to say, I am not too keen on accepting as gospel a report that has drawn so heavily on the views of Professor Lovelock.

Mark Lazarowicz: Perhaps we can now see why the speech of a previous speaker was written in green ink. I ask the hon. Gentleman to be a bit more positive about the prospects for renewable energy. No one suggests that it can meet all of Scotland's needs, but is there not now increasing evidence that renewables could easily supply 40 per cent. or 50 per cent. of Scotland's energy needs, and could also provide an increasing export potential to the rest of the UK? Is not the fact that renewable energy prospects are underplayed significantly one of the problems with the report? The report, I am afraid, does Scotland a disservice: it leaves that possibility underplayed.

John Barrett: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's comments; I shall come to that issue. The combination of the use of renewables with energy saving is not fully explored in the report.

I was saying that I was not keen on accepting Professor Lovelock's guidance as gospel. Although it is clearly important that the report should take evidence from people on all sides of the debate, the fact that Professor Lovelock is such a key witness illustrates its pro-nuclear bias.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): Can the hon. Gentleman confirm whether he was on the Committee? Did he ever press for a Division on any parts of the report, given that he is slagging it off all the time?

John Barrett: I happily confirm that I am not a member of the Committee. However, that does not stop me reading its report and drawing my own conclusions.

Those pro-nuclear tendencies were revealed again when the report discussed the relative cost of nuclear energy and renewables. I am sure that many hon. Members will share my confusion over why the Committee, in comparing the prices of renewables and nuclear power, chose to quote from a single source that gives a favourable price for nuclear energy and an inaccurate one for wind power. The price cited for nuclear power is a nuclear industry fantasy, based on an unproven new generation of nuclear stations that have not been built or run, and on their being built in large numbers.

At best, 2.3p per kWh can be seen as the minimum possible cost if everything goes to plan and the Government underwrite the risks. Renewables industry sources put the average cost for onshore wind power at 3p to 4p per kWh and at 2p to 3p per kWh from the best sites; they put the price of new nuclear at 4p to 7p per kWh. So there are alternative views on the issue. The Government's own figures put the future cost per kWh for onshore wind at 1.5p to 3.6p and for nuclear at 2.5p to 4p.

Mr. David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): It has become clear that with all the interventions, we are having a one-line debate and coal has not been debated. Is it not the only fuel, according to the report, that does not receive a subsidy?

John Barrett: I accept what the hon. Gentleman said, and heard with interest his comments on his experience in the industry and the difficulties of storing nuclear waste. He made a valid point.

The Committee stated that it would have welcomed more time in which to take evidence before producing its report. Perhaps it could have explored the matter more fully if it had had more time, but the general election got in the way. More time might have allowed it the opportunity to balance better its findings and recommendations.

On a more serious note, have we forgotten why we gave up nuclear power in the first place?

Mr. Sarwar: If the hon. Gentleman had read the report, he would have seen the written submission from Scottish and Southern Energy which set out the scenario in Scotland. It states that "Scotland is faced with the prospect of the following sequence of events unfolding: closure of the nuclear power stations; closure of the coal-fired power stations; question marks against the viability of gas-fired and large hydro stations; question marks against longer-term deployment of new renewable energy".

Can the hon. Gentleman tell us whether in any circumstances when facing a stark choice he would rule out nuclear energy?

John Barrett: I would have to be convinced about a number of issues. It was not just storage that was mentioned earlier. Cost and safety are also issues and I am not convinced about the safety issue.

In the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) asked Professor Lovelock about deaths following Chernobyl. Professor Lovelock said that he believed that 45 deaths were attributable to Chernobyl. My hon. Friend asked whether he was aware of the figures suggesting that between 25,000 and 85,000 deaths were associated with Chernobyl.

John Robertson: What was his answer?

John Barrett: The evidence from the World Health Organisation was that there were tens of thousands of deaths, and when Professor Lovelock was asked whether he would stick to 45 he said yes. I was in a cancer hospital in Ukraine 10 years after Chernobyl and it was full of 10-year-old children who were suffering as a direct result of Chernobyl. The doctors confirmed that. There were more than 45 people in that one ward and I do not believe Professor Lovelock's figure.

The nuclear industry has no answer to the storage problem. Moreover, the storage problem at Dounreay does not inspire confidence. Revelations that high-level radioactive waste has been pumped into the sea and that that action was covered up by reckless management must set alarm bells ringing. I am extremely disappointed that the Committee was unable to call UKAEA to account on those accusations.

Hon. Members may be aware that 11 farms in Scotland are still subject to statutory controls and monitoring of sheep for radioactivity as a result of continuing contamination from the Chernobyl accident. Hon. Members do not need reminding that the accident happened 19 years ago and 1,500 miles away. It is interesting that the problems of nuclear power are always couched in language such as "people have fears about nuclear power". They are not just fears; they are very real problems. The problem of how to deal with nuclear waste has not been solved and few are predicting that the report from the Committee on Radioactive Waste Management, which is due out next year, will provide any answers.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman exclude the possibility that a scientific solution will be found? If one were found, would he agree that it might be possible to dispose of waste safely and would he then revise his position on the nuclear industry?

John Barrett: A scientific solution would have to be available or on the near horizon, but the issue goes wider than just storage. Cost and safety issues also arise.

The problem of nuclear waste has simply not been dealt with. The least bad option of finding somewhere to store or dump existing nuclear waste is not a solution and should not be a taken as a green light to create more nuclear waste. If we in Scotland, with the wealth of natural resources at our fingertips, are unable to commit fully to renewable energy and instead fall back on nuclear power, what message are we sending out to the rest of the world? How can we preach to the Irans of the future about alternatives to nuclear power when we ourselves are bowing to a knee-jerk pro-nuclear response to our own energy problems? We have a great responsibility on our shoulders that we cannot escape and must not try to avoid. Scotland should be the world leader in renewable energy. We have the natural resources, the skills and the ambition, yet this report and the Government's response seem to indicate a lukewarm political will.

3.40 pm

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): This is an important debate, but I am becoming a little concerned that the focus is on the nuclear industry only. It is important to widen the debate a little, particularly as Scotland is so rich in energy sources. We have coal and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Hamilton) rightly said, we have oil and gas. We have hydro, wind and wave, and we might even have tidal. As colleagues said, Scotland also has a substantial chunk of the UK nuclear industry.

One big problem is that we have not always been able properly to exploit our advantages in energy. For example, we have not built a new hydro station since the late 1960s, yet the hydro stations are still functioning. The oldest one, the Foyers power station, was privately built more than 100 years ago by British Aluminium to feed its plant in the highlands. It is still functioning and producing electricity for the grid. All the stations that were built after the war in the North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board area are still functioning. They are producing clean, low-cost energy.

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): On a point of information, is my hon. Friend aware that consent has recently been given for a new hydroelectric power scheme at Glendoe near Fort Augustus in my constituency?

Mr. Doran: I am aware of that, but I was not aware that I was the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friend.

Mr. Weir: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Glendoe station to which the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) referred faced the same problems as wind farms? There were objections to it, and that is one of the problems with the communities.

Mr. Doran: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. In fact, every one of the hydro schemes in the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s faced a torrent of objections and abuse, yet now they are seen as a natural part of the landscape. Indeed, the Pitlochry power station and dam are huge tourist attractions.

Mr. Tom Harris: On a point of information, my hon. Friend may be interested to know, if he does not already, that the Cruachan hydroelectric dam is, in fact, a net user of electricity. It uses electricity to push water up the hill when electricity is cheap, then the water flows back down when the demand is higher and the cost of electricity is therefore higher as well. Would he agree that hydroelectric may not play that big a part in meeting the energy gap in the years to come?

Mr. Doran: My hon. Friend simplifies the issue far too much. Cruachan was built to meet the peak offload. It was expensive in those days to have a full coal power station burning, so cheap electricity was used to pump the water. Then, when surplus energy was needed, Cruachan filled the gap. That is why it is there. It is part of the security of supply system, which is so important.

My hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian mentioned the coal industry, which, since privatisation, has been completely run down. Two major power stations in Scotland are still burning coal; Cockenzie and Longannet. At one time, Fife had an experimental coal gasification project. Part of the by-product went to the chemical plant further along the road. Fife and Grimethorpe were world leaders in developing gas from coal, but we lost that position because there has been no attempt since privatisation to find new markets for coal. However, we are moving into a new era, and exploiting coal and developing ways of exploiting it will be much more important than some of the other issues that we have been discussing.

Twenty years ago, Scotland was a world leader in wind technology, but that technology was not developed, mainly because the Government refused to put any money into it. We lost the lead, which has gone to the Netherlands. Wind technology is not rocket science, but we had the control to develop that technology 20 years ago and lost it. Likewise with wave power; we have all heard of Salter's duck, which was a world leader. It may not have been the most efficient device, and a great deal of work needed to be done to it, but it was never properly developed, again because money was not invested by the Government.

There was one simple reason why the money was not invested by Government; all the money was going to pay for nuclear. I worked in the electricity industry. When I left school, I went to work for the North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board. I can remember the push for nuclear in the 1960s and 1970s. Everything was dropped in favour of nuclear. No investment was made in virtually any other type of station because everything had to go into nuclear. It is important to recognise the faults of the past and the problems that we created for ourselves by losing our lead in wind technology, by not developing alternative uses of coal and by focusing so heavily on nuclear. The Government need to take that lesson seriously.

Oil and gas is obviously an industry that I am more familiar with today. I thought that it would be interesting to mention some figures because there is a sense in the debate that the oil and gas industry is finished and that its days are over. The figures that were handed to me today by the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association, the trade body for the offshore operators, show that capital investment in the North sea for 2005 is £4.5 billion. That is more than 20 per cent. of all the investment in manufacturing industry in the UK. That is not an industry that is finished. In fact, the majority of oil companies tell us that we have at least 30 years—perhaps more—of oil and gas left in the North sea. My experience of forecasts on the future production of oil and gas around the world is that they are always wrong. Technology improves the ability to extract more fuel and we keep finding more sources. Of course, we are talking about finite fuels but, at the end of the day, we have a long history in front of us, if I can put it in that rather tortured way.

The total expenditure by the oil and gas industry in the UK in 2005 is £11 billion, a staggering figure. I do not have an estimate for this year's tax take by the Government, but the oil industry estimates that, over the longer term, there is as much as £120 billion still to come to the Treasury from the oil and gas industry. Those assumptions were made with a price of $40 a barrel; at the moment, the price is more than $60 dollars a barrel.

Mr. David Hamilton: Is my hon. Friend aware that BP, along with Scottish and Southern Energy, has announced a power plant at Peterhead in Aberdeenshire? CO_2 will be piped through the Miller oilfield, extending the life of the oilfield by another 25 years.

Mr. Doran: That is what the next part of my speech is about. It is important to consider where the oil industry is. We are talking about private operators that know the energy market around the world. My hon. Friend quite rightly pointed out that BP, along with Scottish and Southern Energy—the old hydro board—decided to invest up to £600 million in a brand-new project, which marks a first in the world. Again, Scotland is at the forefront of technology and developments in energy. The existing Miller oilfield will be used as a dumping ground for carbon dioxide produced by the separation of natural gas to produce hydrogen, which will be burned to produce electricity.

The project is enormously important. I was lucky enough to have a briefing from BP on the matter recently. BP is already discussing the project with Governments around the world. We hope that, in the future, technology developed and applied in Scotland will be driving the power stations of China and India, two of the biggest potential users of energy in the world and two of the biggest potential polluters. The technology is clean and will help to protect the environment.

It is also important to record the fact that in the city that I represent, Aberdeen, we are obviously preparing for the downturn in oil and gas, because they are in decline. The experts say that we have produced roughly half the gas and oil that there is to produce and we have the other half still to produce. If that forecast is correct, we are in the decline phase. Aberdeen, as a city—together with the Scottish Executive, the DTI, Scottish Enterprise and all the bodies that matter in the oil industry—is advancing the technology that we have developed in north-east Scotland. Importantly, the Peterhead power station is not just an anomaly. Virtually all the world's offshore oil and gas environments are using technology that was developed offshore in Aberdeen.

Based in Aberdeen and Aberdeenshire, we have the largest, most innovative, most forward looking sub-sea technologies operation anywhere in the world. At every offshore oil and gas field worldwide, there will be people and companies based in Aberdeen carrying out the sub-sea technology. They are now moving from working in the oil and gas industries to looking at other ways of using their technologies, such as tunnels and cables. There are amazing things spinning off from the oil and gas industries.

We reckon we have the largest concentration of IT specialists anywhere in the UK. Cambridge claims that it is top, but we think we have more and are putting in our claim. So the message is, when looking at energy, look where the oil companies are going. Look at the Peterhead station, which I mentioned. BP announced this week that it is about to invest up to $6,000 million over the next few years in alternative technologies from renewables. It has already invested massively in other technologies, as has Shell and other companies, and is increasing that investment. I have not checked the figures, but BP may be spending almost as much on renewables as it has in the past on the development of oil and gas supplies.

For me, there are three lessons from the report and the discussions around it. First, it is important to develop diverse sources of supply. I must go on record as not being a supporter of nuclear, but it is important that the nuclear case be examined. It is also important not to repeat the experience of the 1960s, when other forms of energy were relegated and seen as less important than developing nuclear.

Secondly, private sector investment will be important, but Government support and investment is crucial. If that dries up, it will be a disaster for the country in the longer term, as we have to replace the nuclear facilities. Finally, it is important that we continue to invest in clean sources of energy. Scotland has them in abundance.

3.53 pm

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): Thank you, Mr Amess, for calling me to speak in this debate. I am grateful for the opportunity to do so, not least because I am now also a member of the Scottish Affairs Committee. I would like to congratulate the Chairman of the Committee, the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Sarwar), on his eloquent opening to the debate, which set out the various conclusions and recommendations in the report.

As several other hon. Members have said—not least the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Doran)—our debate has been dominated by a discussion of nuclear energy. I myself do not propose to go into that, but would like to associate myself with the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett).

There are a couple of issues that I am keen to address. The first is the issue of renewables. The second recommendation of the report was on emerging technologies and the need for further research and development into them and renewables. That is a very important point, and the Government response to that particular recommendation was weak. It took a passive approach to developing these emerging technologies, rather than the more active approach which would be much more useful, not least, in relation to what might be termed wet renewables. That is, the possibility of generating electricity from wave, tidal and, indeed, offshore wind power.

Wave and tidal power, in particular, offer a huge opportunity; a steady source of electricity generation, unlike the problems, in some circumstances, that were described around wind power. It is a form of technology that has not yet been much developed or exploited by other countries, so it also offers us in Scotland—especially in the highlands and islands—an enormous opportunity to develop a new industrial sector. We can take the lead there.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North made the sensible point that we were ahead in the field of wind power 20 years ago, but we lost that lead because investment was diverted into the nuclear industry. We have the opportunity again, particularly in the highlands and islands, to take the lead in a new industrial sector: wave and tidal power. Companies are already pursuing that and the UK Government need to take a much more active role in pursuing and encouraging those forms of renewable technology. The Scottish Executive recently announced a new generation of renewables obligation certificates specifically targeted at generation from wave and tidal power, which will offer more of an economic incentive for companies in that sector to develop technology in the knowledge that there will be a market for it when it is ready to go to that level.

Mr. Tom Harris: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument very carefully and I wonder whether he can offer the House a specific time scale as to when those forms of power will generate a sufficient level of energy to meet Scotland's future energy needs. I hope that he will give us a definite time scale because his party has already said on the record that it will not support nuclear energy until a definite time scale is given on the solution to the problem of nuclear waste disposal. If he is so keen on time scales and deadlines, perhaps he could give us one for this sort of energy.

Danny Alexander: I am not sure that it was me who introduced the question of time scales and deadlines; it was the hon. Gentleman who did that. However, it is a good point and the answer we get to that question depends on whom we talk to in the wave and tidal power industry. For example, Mr. Jimmy Ferguson of Wavegen gave evidence to the Committee during the production of its report and his company—former company as it is now—estimated that it would take somewhere between five and 10 years before that particular form of generation would be ready to make the enormous contribution it has the potential to make.

Mr. Harris: It will not make any contribution.

Danny Alexander: I think it will make a substantial contribution, not least because, for example, in the Pentland firth between the north coast of the highlands and the Orkney islands, we have one of the greatest natural power houses in Europe for the generation of tidal and wave energy. As I said earlier, the Scottish Executive recently announced a new generation of renewables obligation certificates for those forms of generation and I hope that that will be followed up at Westminster. So far, the Government in Westminster have not chosen to offer such incentives.

It is worth referring to the European marine energy testing centre that has been developed in Orkney for the pursuit of such technologies, which offers an enormous opportunity for those developments. I hope that the energy review that the Government have recently announced will not be a simple-minded dash for nuclear. I hope that due emphasis will be given to the technologies that I mentioned.

Recommendation 7 of the Committee's report sought to address the transmission infrastructure, which is very important to us in Scotland. The Committee made a specific recommendation about the charging regime, calling for it to be reviewed. I welcome the announcement that was made during the debate on the private Member's Bill of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) regarding the time scale for the cap—

Mr. Hood: The hon. Gentleman refers to a dash for nuclear. Does he understand that the argument is not to dash for more nuclear but for new build to keep the proportion of generation that we have at present, rather than increase it?

Danny Alexander: That is the argument made by those hon. Members who have spoken in favour of nuclear in this debate. I am not sure that it is an argument I necessarily agree with, but I understand that it is the argument presented by him and his pro-nuclear colleagues.

I was talking about the development of the transmission infrastructure and the charging regime. The cap for transmission charges from the islands has been extended in time, which is clearly a positive development, but I want the Government to consider extending that cap to electricity generated in the mainland highlands of Scotland as well. Many of the reasons why the charging regime is a disincentive to electricity generation in the islands also apply to the highland areas.

There are currently proposals to upgrade the electricity transmission infrastructure between Beauly and Denny and the proposed route would pass through the constituencies of some hon. Members including my own. That raises a number of issues relating to the transport infrastructure. Although the decision about whether the development should go ahead is a matter for the Scottish Executive and the Scottish Parliament, the framework within which such decisions are taken is influenced and, to a large extent, set at a UK level, not least because of the rules through which these sorts of developments are financed. We need a framework for such decisions at a UK level that allow community wishes and environmental needs to be taken into account, and a process that allows a full assessment and a strategic approach to look at all the options for developing the transmission infrastructure.

Hon. Members will be aware that the company AMEC came forward earlier this week with a proposal, saying that it would be feasible to develop a sub-sea transmission cable taking electricity from the western isles to Hunterston, rather than transmitting it from the western isles via pylons through the mainland. Such a sub-sea transmission option could help to support the long-term objective of promoting wave and tidal power that I have described. It would also offer advantages from an environmental point of view. I hope that that idea will be given active consideration in due course.

I hope that the Minister will respond to the following question. Because of the cost rules, the regulatory environment at the moment for extensions or upgrades to the transmission infrastructure means that longer-term proposals to meet the needs of a long-term energy strategy are harder to justify than the shorter-term developments, such as Beauly-Denny, which, although they may satisfy immediate needs, may not be the best route for the long-term energy development strategy for Scotland.

Another issue relating to the framework in which such developments are financed is the undergrounding of cabling in sensitive areas, for example, around Beauly, an area of heavy population, and the part of the route that passes through the Cairngorms national park. There is a good case for allowing the proposed upgrade to the transmission of infrastructure to be undergrounded in such areas. Again, that is at least partly an issue for Ofgem and the financing regime for such development. If funding can be made available for undergrounding through Ofgem and the regulations, it will allow the upgrades to take place.

Mr. Weir: Has the hon. Gentleman seen the briefing from the Scottish Renewables Forum e-mailed to

[Mr. Weir]

Members today, regarding Beauly-Denny and particularly the question of undergrounding, which says that it is impossible to underground a line of this voltage because, due to the strength of the line, it would require a trench the size of a modern motorway? Is it not important not to mislead people on this point?

Danny Alexander: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's point. I have not seen the briefing. I have not spent as much time in my office today as I should, awaiting that e-mail.

It is equally worth while pointing out that undergrounding cables of similar voltage has taken place, for example, in the Vale of York, as has already been highlighted. We need to ensure that that option be given active consideration, and that all the options are assessed before a decision is made and are not blocked purely for financial reasons, when there could be other longer-term environmental benefits.

Community benefit is not explicitly addressed in the report, but as hon. Members will know it has increasingly become part of the policy framework for renewable energy developments. It ensures that local communities get some benefit from a wind farm, for example, or from the new hydro dam that is being built in Fort Augustus, which I mentioned earlier to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North. Perhaps I should not have called him my hon. Friend, although I agreed with much of what he said. Community benefit has taken place in many of areas and that concept should be applied to developments of the transmission infrastructure and the major pylon developments that we will see.

Recommendation 10 in the report refers to the energy efficiency of buildings and talks specifically about tax breaks for it, which is important in the sphere of industrial buildings. As many hon. Members will know, industrial buildings are often built on a speculative basis, so the developers look to do so on a least-cost basis. For the person who takes over the building, whether buying or renting it, having a more energy-efficient structure will not only be good for the environment but will reduce their costs in the long run. Some tax incentives, perhaps through the industrial buildings allowance so that additional relief could be given to developers of energy-efficient industrial buildings, should be considered so that that recommendation of the report can be taken forward in fiscal policy. I hope that the Minister will pass that suggestion on to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the forthcoming Budget because such measures could make a big difference.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. David Amess (in the Chair): Order. I do want to call everyone and I appeal to the Chamber to bear that in mind.

4.6 pm

Mr. David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): I will try to make my speech as quick as possible, Mr. Amess and I have already ditched half of it. I want to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. McGovern), who is not here now, for giving me his glasses last night. I was not able to read the papers until this morning. Until then I did not realise that I was going blind; it is really bad nowadays.

I am delighted to be associated with the Scottish Affairs Committee's report, particularly with its clarity and conclusions. I resent some of the comments that have been made about it being one-sided. As someone who does not come from a nuclear background, I did not think that it was skewed. The debate has become skewed with people's opinions about what should happen. The report, as I hope to show, has been clear in delivering that. Indeed, we were congratulated by all sectors, including those involved with renewables, because of our balanced view. We gave everybody the opportunity to go forward.

The report develops a picture of our energy needs that is objectively considered and takes into account all the viewpoints in the energy debate. It is not only relevant to Scotland but to the rest of the UK and although it is a Scottish Affairs Committee report, we should always keep in mind that we are part of the UK and we have to consider the balances that take place over a period of time.

One absolute in the debate is that we face a decline in gas and oil. I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Doran) that that decline is on a much longer time scale than some people suggest. On that point alone, we should remember that nuclear provides 37.2 per cent. of energy in Scotland; hydro, which is being extended but can be extended only by a small amount, provides 6 per cent.; gas provides 20.3 per cent.; coal provides 29.4 per cent.; renewables provide 1.7 per cent. As renewables grow, others will begin to decline. Even in the long term, if we were to take gas out, we would require renewables to fill a 20 per cent. gap. If we take nuclear out, there will be a 37 per cent. gap. Over the next 20 years, there is no way that renewables can fill the gap that will be left.

At the end of the day, the question must be what can fill that gap. Coal can fill that gap as well as other sources. The coal industry has been put forward and a lot of discussions have taken place about it, which I believe underlines its powerful position. We have a generation gap that is limited. The emergence of renewables has to be taken seriously. I have taken a view that over a period of time what seemed like the view of tree-huggers and environmentalists now has to be taken as realistic. Ten years ago, we were talking about it in such terms. We are now talking about environmentalist issues and at the beginning of any debate about energy we must consider the environment and what the cost will be, and not just in financial terms. After all, all such sources are subsidised to some extent.

In the Committee, on 1 February, I asked Mr. Mortimer, from Scottish Power, whether Scottish Power would be involved in windmills and renewables if they were not subsidised. The answer was no. The Government must give encouragement for all sources of power to be considered. Apart from coal, gas and oil, everybody is subsidised to some extent.

Mr. Hood: Obviously, my hon. Friend and I, coming from the same background, have similar views on the need to support the coal industry. As he rightly says, there is a future for coal in Scottish energy generation. However, the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) says that he supports open-cast coaling but then adds a caveat about the SPP16, which will devastate coal production in Scotland so that the coal burned will be imported. We are going to be exporting jobs and importing coal. What does my hon. Friend think of that?

Mr. Hamilton: My hon. Friend makes a good point. I further suggest that instead of considering Chapelcross as a potential for nuclear power, it should be considered as a potential for biomass. That would allow development of open-cast and deep mining of coal to take place in Dumfriesshire. We could then take the coal directly to a reconditioned area.

David Mundell: I am sure that my hon. Friends will be pleased to know that I am supportive of the open-cast development at Glenmucklock near Kirkconnel in my constituency. I am, indeed, supportive of the open-cast industry, as the hon. Member for Lanark and Hamilton, East (Mr. Hood) just said. When Labour Ministers in Scottish Parliament considered the SPP16, they were not convinced that the open-cast industry would be massively devastated by its introduction. Is the hon. Gentleman aware of any evidence to suggest that it would be?

Mr. Hamilton: I shall come to that point in my remarks about the Scottish Executive making decisions without looking above the horizon. It is one thing to make provision where the possibility of open-cast mining can be restricted, but the people who oppose open-cast mining will also oppose windmills being put in their back yards. I, as a local Member—there are others here who do not belong in the cities—must understand that if applications are being put forward in that area. I have received numerous complaints about the possibility of wind farms being established some distance away. Of course, people do not want that. The same arguments apply with open-cast mining, but it is far more productive and does not require the same subsidy.

I come to the extremely important point of the research being carried out by Professor Peter J. Hall from the university of Strathclyde. I met him some time ago when I went to Fife and he told me about what they were producing and how they can put CO_2 emissions back into the earth. Of course, what would come out would be pure methane. That is a diversion from what is being done with oil, but the great thing about it is that CO_2 emissions can be absorbed like a sponge. That development was talked about in the coal mining industry 25 years ago; the development was there when the industry had its own research and development.

We have lost the game on this one. The United States of America is making an investment to the tune of £10 billion to consider how a new strategy can be developed. The Americans will not turn their backs on the abundance of coal that they have. It is dire that this country is sitting on billions of tonnes of coal, and that we have extracted only 15 per cent. of our coal. Some European countries look at us with envy because of what we have and what we could do with it. We turn our back on those possibilities at our peril.

I remind colleagues that China is expanding at such a rate that it is becoming the engine house of the world. It is considering establishing 20 nuclear and 500 coal-fired power stations. We in the UK and Europe have developed a structure in which CO_2 emissions can be incorporated into a power station—the Germans are considering a development that will do that—and there is an interested party to export it to; China is interested in that expertise. We should develop it for ourselves too. That would allow the expansion of the Longannet complex; Scottish Power told me, when I went to visit, that it would like to take it further than its 2015 schedule. However, it also said that it will not invest the money without a guarantee that it can run the coal over that period. It is looking at using carbon capture, but it needs incentives to do so.

We must consider what happens throughout the world. Virtually all the coal coming out of Australia is being poured into China. New Zealand has doubled the size of its mining industry due to one client; China. India and the US are not far behind. At our peril, we in Europe will take our eye off the ball and we must look towards the goal, which must be to develop a structure and a strategy within the country whereby there is enough room for everyone around the table. Over time, I have had to open my mind to the possibility of nuclear power becoming part of the jigsaw.

I draw the Minister's attention to a one-liner in the report. It is not good, but the Committee makes a recommendation about new house and property build, and planning issues. That is the remit of the Scottish Executive, but we must consider that it is far cheaper to build a new house and install insulation at the same time rather than encourage the population to insulate houses after they have been built. Such matters might be within the planning remit of the Scottish Executive, but the United Kingdom Parliament must decide that we should take such action. I have spoken to major building contractors, who said that if such decisions are made across the board there will be no problem. After all, those with whom they will have to compete must deal with the same standards.

Mr. Weir rose—

Mr. Hamilton: This will probably be a speech rather than an intervention.

Mr. Weir: No. I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way but, strangely enough, Sarah Boyack—a Labour MSP—has introduced a private Member's Bill in the Scottish Parliament to deal with the matter.

Mr. Hamilton: It was a good point to make and I am glad that a Labour MSP has introduced such a Bill. If we could have, we would have supported it. If we were serious about saving energy and delivering an energy policy to the British people so that we can compete on a even keel with the rest of our European partners—an important factor—that would be right for the people of Britain. The report is balanced. All those from whom I have received information said that it was very fair and some unfair comments have been made.

4.17 pm

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): I am obviously not from Scotland, Mr. Amess; you can tell that by my accent. I represent a seat that is north of the M25 by about 500 yd. I am here at the invitation of my Chairman, the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Sarwar), and the Clerk of the Select Committee.

The debate is timely. For the first time since 1996, the United Kingdom is a net importer of gas. We have 11 days' gas storage in reserve compared with an EU average of 55. Since 2003, the cost of electricity has increased by nearly 40 per cent. That is having an impact on Scottish business and Scottish domestic users. Moreover, Scotland obtains 39 per cent. of its energy from nuclear reactors. Torness is due to close in 2023 and Hunterston is to close in 2011. In response to the looming energy crisis in Scotland, the Scottish Executive suggested that the focus for renewables should be 40 per cent. of Scotland's overall energy usage. A quarter of that comes from hydro, a half from wind power and a quarter from emerging technologies.

When considering energy, there is no free ride. All the so-called environmental solutions have pitfalls. Hydroelectricity produces very little useful electricity. The environmental implications for the ecosystem, rivers, upstream erosion and migratory fish runs, are fairly significant. Wind tends to divide communities. A sea of windmills all over the place may seem a good idea to the Greens who do not live in the area, but if people see windmills from their back door, the idea might not seem so good to them. Members of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds are appalled by the number of birds that are sliced up—Kenwood Chef'ed—by propelling blades. Wind power is also unreliable.

I like to spend a lot of time in Scotland.

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): We are debating wind farms and renewables. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in the case of responsible applications for wind farms, the RSPB plays a significant role in determining whether the siting of windmills is appropriate for the migrating paths of birds?

Mr. Walker: It is good that the RSPB is involved and I am sure that it will continue to be involved, but wind farms are not the long-term solution to meeting future energy needs, in England or in Scotland. The cost is not outweighed by the reward.

Mr. Joyce: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that there is no place for wind farms, full stop, or do they have a place in an intelligent energy mix?

Mr. Walker: I think that the people promoting wind farms have rather overplayed their hand. Wind farms are not the long-term solution. They will produce a bit of energy, like hydro does, but they will not meet the energy needs of Scotland or the UK. Tidal wave schemes have been mentioned, but in the Cardiff bay area we have seen their impact on estuary environments. Nuclear fusion has possibilities, but other hon. Members have mentioned that it might be 50 years away.

That leaves us with coal, which pollutes, creates greenhouse gases and does not put us in good favour with our Kyoto partners, and gas, which we know is running out.

Mr. David Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman should have listened to some of the debate. I will give an example of one of the things that coal is involved in. The Monktonhall colliery in my constituency of Midlothian closed in the 1980s. That colliery is now being considered for a pilot scheme involving hot water to heat some 4,000 houses in the Midlothian area. There are 250 ex-mines in the whole of Scotland, two thirds of which could be similarly utilised for housing heating systems throughout Scotland. That is a way of using money to examine things that are outside the envelope. It is about time that we had a bit of horizon thinking here, because it is not happening.

Mr. Walker: Perhaps I was a little flippant about coal. Of course there is a place for it; there are clean coal technologies and there is scrubbing. However, I do not think that any leader of a global power, beyond George Bush—I know that Labour Members do not perhaps rate him as highly as others—believes that coal is the long-term future in terms of meeting the world's energy needs. That leaves us with the option of nuclear power. Again, that divides the House. However, if France can generate 75 per cent. of its energy from nuclear power and Belgium, Sweden and Switzerland can respectively generate 55 per cent, 50 per cent. and 40 per cent. of their energy from it, and those countries can get rid of their waste in a way that does not cause a great deal of public concern, I do not understand why nuclear energy and its advancement in Scotland and the United Kingdom meet with such hostility.

Sir Robert Smith: The hon. Gentleman says that all the countries he listed have already got rid of their nuclear waste with no problem. Will he enlighten the Chamber as to how they have disposed of their nuclear waste on a permanent basis?

Mr. Walker: I am afraid that I cannot enlighten the Chamber on how they have done that and I am perfectly happy to say so. However, 75 per cent. of France's power comes from nuclear fuel.

John Robertson: In Finland, they put the waste into granite, 5 miles down in the ground. They have it securely contained. They are building a new heavy duty repository. I can also point to the report that has just been submitted by Canada on doing something similar by putting all its waste in one area deep underground.

Mr. Walker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his helpful intervention.

Nuclear power and nuclear power technology has come a long way in the past 30 years. There are now off-the-shelf designs for nuclear power stations. They cost between £1 billion and £1.5 billion. A new nuclear power station can be built within five years, but of course the timeline would be longer because planning permission and the consent of local people would be required.

I take the point that nuclear power creates a lot of concern. It is perceived in this country as a secretive and dangerous industry. Some of that concern is misplaced, but it is the responsibility of Government and those who are promoting nuclear power to try to meet the concerns and persuade the public that if we are to meet this country's long-term energy needs, we cannot rule out nuclear power out of hand. There is certainly a place for nuclear power. I hope that over the next 10 to 15 years we will start to win the argument and that more of our energy will be produced by nuclear power, because it offers the best long-term solution to our energy needs. As has been rightly pointed out, there is enough nuclear material buried underground, which has not yet been mined, to last generation after generation.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Lanark and Hamilton, East) (Lab): I draw the attention of hon. Members to my declared interest in the Scottish coal industry. I have, like my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Hamilton), cut down my speech to make time for other hon. Members to speak. I thought that I had a balanced speech that would serve the report well. However, the contribution of the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) almost tempted me away from balance. As a member of the all-party group on nuclear energy, I would not invite the hon. Gentleman on to a platform on which I was speaking, if that is how he argues.

I welcome the debate on the report, which, as hon. Members have said, is balanced. It identified the need for debate. It is apt that the House is now giving more consideration to energy than it was when the inquiry was undertaken. Credit is due to the Scottish Affairs Committee of the previous Parliament.

Perhaps I may be allowed to do a bit of personal bitching. I have enjoyed the debate immensely so far. Holding Westminster Hall debates was among the best decisions of the House in the past few years. They allow Back Benchers an opportunity that they did not have in the past to discuss issues of great importance. However, I think that today's debate should have taken place in the Scottish Grand Committee. I think that I have seen Halley's comet since we last had a Scottish Grand Committee, and I want to mention it, not as a criticism but as a wee point to be mentioned in a chat over a cup of tea later.

It has been said that Scotland is rich in energy generation. We produce 60 per cent. more than we need at present. We are exporting generation. However, in that richness we should not be complacent. As other hon. Members have mentioned, referring to the White Paper, nuclear generation in Scotland is more than 37 per cent. Coal burn is almost 30 per cent. and 20 per cent. is gas. [Interruption.] I am sorry if I am interrupting my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce). The renewables are way down at 1.7 per cent. It is beyond belief that politicians can seriously argue, as they do, that we should close down nuclear and coal generation and fill the gap. That is mathematically impossible and we need to get that point across.

Do we want—this is the main point of the debate—to put our energy supply in the hands of suppliers outside our country? Do we want, for example, Mr. Putin or any of his successors to make decisions on the price of gas here, or on whether we are to have gas? I remember about 15 years ago listening to debates in the House about how in 20 or 30 years we would have to get all our gas from Russia. It went over my head, but it is not going over our heads now. It is a reality. We are now a net importer of gas and by 2020 we will be importing 70 per cent. of it. Hon. Members should try to get their minds round the problem before they start to cherry-pick and say, "Oh, we'll have renewables here. We'll have nice wind farms."

The hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell), who is my Member of Parliament at present, talks about problems with his windmills. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian says rightly so. It is beyond comprehension that people think windmills are a good idea in someone else's village or community. Frankly, the Government should have introduced the issue of new nuclear build two years ago. That is when we should have been arguing about it.

I said earlier that the argument is not about a dash for nuclear, to use that expression; no one argues that we should supply more energy through nuclear power than we do at present. The issue is whether there should be new build, which will mean less waste to deal with, and whether, at the same time, we should look to our other strong energy producer, clean coal technology.

That technology is with us. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Doran) talked about Grimethorpe 30 years ago; I remember Grimethorpe. I also remember going to Houston, Texas—Mr. Bush's stronghold—18 years ago, and looking at clean coal technology; coal gasification was being developed there, so the technology is in place. As was pointed out, Nye Bevan once said that we are a country built on coal, and so we are. We have so much natural energy that it is nonsense to argue that we go elsewhere for it. We go to the most dangerous part of the world for it. The lack of rationality in this debate beggars belief. I tell hon. Members that although this is a wonderful debating exercise for us—the political classes—believe me, the people outside will not understand it.

Mr. Joyce: I got slightly confused there; my hon. Friend was talking about coal one minute, and gas the next. Does he not agree that the point is that one can get gas from a variety of sources? Indeed, we already do; we will shortly be importing gas from Kuwait, for example, so that we can maintain security of supply through gas. That is not to say that we do not want other sources of energy, but we can maintain security of supply—even though we are talking only of gas—by bringing gas from different sources, and by different means.

Mr. Hood: I am sorry if my hon. Friend misunderstood my speech; he was probably not listening, and chatting to his colleague instead, as he did earlier.

I hope that this will make sense to my hon. Friend: we need to have a debate about how we will supply Scotland's energy needs without relying on imported fuel over which we do not have control. If we do have to rely on imported fuel, the issue will be security of supply, and we will then address that argument. If we have that debate, then—as my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian said—everyone will come to the table.

I am not arguing the case for nuclear power. I am pro-coal, having been a miner for 23 years. However, I accept the reality that we cannot talk about security of supply without accepting that nuclear has to be part of the mix. There is the development of clean coal technology, into which the Americans are rightly putting billions of pounds. That technology is being developed in this country, too. We should embrace the new technologies, and not get into our trenches.

Let me say something about the coal industry, and the debate held in the House a fortnight ago on the threat to gas supplies this winter, which we are told will be bad. Last winter, coal produced 48 per cent. of this country's requirements when we needed it. We would be very foolish to walk away from our coal industry. I am sure that we will not. We would be equally foolish to walk away from the reality, which is that we are not going to rely on renewables saving the day for us. If that is the debate, we welcome it. I hope that the report is an important part of the debate that the country needs to have.

4.35 pm

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate, because I served on the Committee that produced the report. I was the only member who in the vote opposed the report's nuclear parts. The report covers much more than nuclear, and I should like to touch on those aspects first, and come to the blood-on-the-carpet stuff later.

Before doing so, I should like to echo what the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Sarwar) said about the Chairman of that Committee, the now ennobled Baroness Adams of Craigielea. She was a fine Chairman, and the Committee's members got on very well together, despite our differences about nuclear power. The Committee produced a good report. I do not agree with all that was said by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) about its defects. Apart from the nuclear aspects, I have no problem with it; it is a fine report.

We all agreed that doing nothing is not an option. We should still agree on that. Our first recommendation was for a full audit, and it is interesting to note the Government's response to it:

"The government were fully committed to the framework for UK energy policy set out in the 2003 energy white paper."

Given the Prime Minister's speech to the CBI this week, I am not sure that that is now entirely correct, since the White Paper stated that on economic grounds the nuclear option did not add up.

I have no problem with the review of energy need, if it is a genuine review. My problem with the Prime Minister's proposal is that I suspect that the review will consist of going to the filing cabinet at No. 10 and taking out an already written report. We shall return to that.

Unfortunately the Government have not done much about other technologies. That takes us to recommendation 2, in which we unanimously—I stress unanimously— expressed some doubt about the ill-defined emerging technologies, and whether they would meet one quarter of Scotland's energy needs. We urged further research and development, and I am still of that opinion.

I am pro renewable energy; I have doubts about nuclear energy. I want to ensure that renewables meet the advertised targets. It was interesting that even the renewables forum—and others—would not say that that would definitely happen. We must sort that out. I have seen little progress from the Government on that front. We do not seem to be any nearer to a commercial wave or tidal generator in Scotland, other than the small-scale one on Islay. As the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) mentioned, Eon recently announced that it is establishing a biomass generator, although it may be some time before it is up and running.

The Government have so far staunchly resisted attempts by myself in a Private Member's Bill and by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith in his private Member's Bill to introduce a renewable heat obligation that would give a significant boost to the use of biomass energy.

Although the Government's response to the recommendation stated that their support needed to be technology-neutral, most new technologies, and even old technologies such as nuclear, would none the less need support to become a significant part of the energy mix.

It is interesting that we are discussing what the Government have to do for nuclear, because as has been pointed out, there is nothing preventing any energy producer from applying for a new nuclear power station. The reason why they do not do so is that they want to know that they will be able to sell electricity at a price that will make it economic. I understand that Electricité de France—strangely enough, the French-run entity that owns London Electricity—has recently suggested that it might be interested in it, but that before doing so, it is looking for long-term guarantees about the price of electricity. That should be borne in mind.

Mr. David Hamilton: If the hon. Gentleman were being fair and equal, he would also acknowledge that renewables would not exist if they were not subsidised.

Mr. Weir: I accept that, but as energy prices rise, the need for subsidy falls. Every energy source, whether renewable, nuclear or whatever, becomes more economic the higher the energy prices are.

John Robertson: That is not strictly true. There is a Canadian company that would be quite willing, given the opportunity, to provide new build in this country. That would be at no cost to the Government.

Mr. Weir: I am surprised to hear that, because there is nothing to prevent that company from entering our liberalised market.

That brings us to recommendation 7, which relates to electricity transmission charges. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander), who is no longer present, alluded to the issue. We have reached an absolutely insane position, which is being driven by Ofgem. The regulator determined that the further a generator was from the centres of population, the higher the charges should be for it to enter the grid system. The rationale—if we can give it that name—is that energy companies should be encouraged to site new generation nearer to centres of population.

The problem is that the areas most likely to produce a significant amount of renewable energy are not near centres of population, but in the north of Scotland and the islands. That has an impact not only on renewables generators, but on all generators, including the Peterhead gas cycle station and anything new that is built in the north, because it puts a massive hurdle in the way of making those stations and facilities viable. In passing, it might be worth noting that if we took that approach to its logical conclusion, any new nuclear generator would probably be built on Ibrox or Princes street gardens.

John Robertson: Why Ibrox?

Mr. Weir: I just wanted to get the hon. Gentleman going.

That approach has been subject to a long campaign. Indeed, as the Government response to the report states:

"The Government also accepted that high charges facing generators in the most remote parts of the Highlands and Islands might inhibit development of new renewable energy generation in an area of considerable potential."

As a result, section 185 was introduced into the Energy Act 2004. Unfortunately, it provides a cap only for a short period—from five years to a maximum of 10. It also relates to area charges, not individual charges. That means that there is insufficient time to allow payback from many of these new processes.

To be fair, the Minister for Energy recognised the extent of the problem during the Second Reading of the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith. He has extended the provisions for the islands but done nothing to help those on the mainland, to whom the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey, who has now resumed his seat, alluded. That effectively stymies much potential from renewables generators and any other generators who might wish to set up in northern Scotland. That is plain crazy, and I appeal to the Minister—even if he takes nothing else from this debate—to take this matter up again with his colleagues at the Department for Trade and Industry get them to tackle this stupid situation.

Mr. Russell Brown: The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) raised a similar point, but I did not intervene then. However, it is important for hon. Members present to understand—if they do not already—that the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) and his colleague the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) continually suggest that we in Scotland are totally disfranchised and get no support. What they always fail to point out, however, is that some transmission charges have been reduced. That is perhaps not the case in the north of Scotland, but it is in other parts of the country. Given that we export power to this side of the border, the transmission charges for tying into the Anglo-Scottish interconnector have been done away with altogether.

Mr. Weir: I understand from discussions with the electricity generators that the effect of doing away with the interconnector charges has been more than wiped out by the other charges for the grid.

The problem that we now face—today's proceedings are indicative of it—is that the debate on this issue is basically a matter of wind versus nuclear; it is a false debate. We have to be honest about the fact that whatever energy supply we have, there will be problems. Wherever a new energy development of any kind is suggested, people will complain about it.

David Mundell: As I understand it, the debate is about meeting Scotland's energy needs. The hon. Gentleman has spoken for 10 minutes, and it would be quite helpful if he would set out how the SNP would meet Scotland's energy needs. Adam Ingram, a colleague of his who represents the South of Scotland in the Scottish Parliament, is strongly opposed to open-cast mining. His colleagues are also opposed to wind farm developments, and his party is clearly anti-nuclear. No technology has been presented to us that will materialise in the next couple of years and meet Scotland's energy gap—unless the hon. Gentleman is saving that for the 2007 elections.

Mr. David Amess (in the Chair): Order. I am mindful of the fact that one Member who served on the Committee is still waiting patiently to speak.

Mr. Weir: Thank you, Mr. Amess. I will come on to the matter that has just been raised shortly, but the point I was making is that there will be a planning and environmental impact whatever route we go down—such as windmills, with their associated new pylons. If we go down the nuclear route, there will also be an impact; wherever we build new nuclear power stations, if we are closing down other options for generation we will have to build new pylons to cover for that.

I turn to the nuclear issue. It is interesting that the nuclear energy body is now talking about itself as being emission-free and green. Those Members who read Private Eye might have noticed an interesting piece about the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority and Bell Pottinger Public Affairs. That company produced biographies of the members of the Trade and Industry Committee, and described their attitude to the nuclear option. I am a member of that Committee, and I have had a look at my biography. It states:

"In January of this year he introduced his Private Members Bill to the House, 'Renewable Heat Obligation Bill', which proposed the boosting of renewable energy resources in order to help greenhouse gas emissions. His wish for a reduction in such emissions does not foster a support for nuclear power."

It sounds like the nuclear industry's own public relations people do not believe it.

We are opposed to nuclear power; I make no bones about that. [Interruption.] I feel like Daniel in the den; if I am given a chance to speak I will say something about this matter. I agree with the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Hamilton)—that is a statement that is not heard often—about coal. There are massive coal reserves under Scotland. It is crazy that we do not make use of them, and of clean coal technology. I disagree with the hon. Member for Lanark and Hamilton, East (Mr. Hood) about Scotland's energy production; according to my figures, nuclear accounts for 24 per cent. of Scotland's energy generation, and coal accounts for 34 per cent. If we close down our coal stations without an alternative, we will have a problem.

Scotland is energy rich. As well as our coal reserves, we are Europe's biggest oil and gas producer. We talked about the country being a net importer of gas. The United Kingdom is a net importer of gas; Scotland is not—it produces more than it uses—and, surprisingly, this debate is about Scotland's energy needs.

We have the potential to become Europe's renewable powerhouse. We have 62 per cent. of the EU's oil, and 25 per cent. of its potential wind and tidal energy. Nuclear energy is not necessary in Scotland. We export more energy than we generate from nuclear. If we are talking about Scotland's energy needs, we do not need nuclear.

Mr. Hood: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Weir: No; I want to finish to give other Members a chance to speak.

Scotland is energy independent—it is a net exporter of electricity—but UK Government policy on transmission charges is driving essential investment in the electricity industry away from Scotland. If this damaging policy continues, when our power stations need to be replaced, Scotland will have to import electricity.

Mr. Hood: I am enjoying hearing this road map to the galaxy. I was quoting from a White Paper of 2003; the figure for coal in Scotland is 29.4 per cent.

Mr. Weir: I was quoting from the Scottish Executive paper; the hon. Gentleman can take his pick.

If we go down the nuclear route, will that give us security of supply? It will not, and I shall say why. We talk about the importation of gas, but we will also have to import uranium to drive nuclear stations. The hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson) says that the modern nuclear stations, which he is keen on—I think they are called pebble bed stations—produce less waste. He is right; they do so because they use more uranium and constantly have to be fed uranium.

Uranium is finite; we cannot rely on getting Canadian uranium for ever. If we go down the nuclear route, we shall end up importing uranium from the 'Stans and other less stable countries, as the rest of the UK is having to do with gas now; Scotland does not need to do so.

Nuclear energy is unnecessary. Scotland is already self-sufficient in energy. We cannot meet Scotland's energy needs because Scotland needs political independence to maintain energy independence, take decisions over its energy future and develop clean, green technology instead of nuclear technology. Until that glorious day comes, I shall dust off my "Nuclear power—no thanks" badge and oppose this move to nuclear.

4.52 pm

Mr. John MacDougall (Glenrothes) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Amess; I am grateful for your help. I shall limit my speech; given the speeches so far, I do not think I have much time.

I have no difficulty with having an open policy and reviewing energy again. It would be a nonsense to rule out any energy source without calculating what its loss would involve. It makes sense to have that review, look into next year and make an input into that review. That is what is being asked through the consultation process that will be built into the review. The Minister for Energy will be leading on the issue and I should like to take the opportunity to put to him some ideas that I hope the Government will take on board.

I want to end on a positive note. We have heard a lot about wind—I make no comment about that. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Doran) mentioned Westfield in Fife. Just now, it has exciting prospects. I do not intend to elaborate too much on that, as that would take much of the gist that is here away from the content of it. However, I should like to advise the House of the potential of our renewables energy project at Westfield and my constituency of Glenrothes.

Fife Energy Ltd has developed an advanced fuel technology and gasification plant, which could produce huge benefits for the whole country. The plant was pioneered by British Gas between the late 1970s and early 1990s and involved an investment of more than £1 billion at today's prices. British Gas knew then that natural gas would run out. Fully developed, Westfield would make a huge contribution towards filling our energy gap and it would help Scotland meet its targets on emissions and biomass diversion.

We are not talking about incineration. There is no burning; no chimney is involved. The process uses steam and oxygen to break down the fuel to produce energy, which can then be fed into the gas interconnector and the national grid. The energy produced is constant—that is, it is not subject to conditions such as wind—and would be supplied at below current pipeline price. That would ensure that the country was not held to ransom by suppliers from abroad, as we saw happen during last week's gas price increase.

The small amounts of waste created by the process can be used productively—for example, in building roads and sea walls and in the chemicals industry. The advanced fuel technology would use all of Scotland's sewage sludge, which in Scotland can no longer be dumped at sea and which we will not be able to incinerate as of December. Most of Scotland's municipal waste could be used in the process of providing this form of energy. That would present our local councils with options that they do not have at present to deal with the masses of compost for which they have no use. The process involves creating solid briquette pellets from sewage sludge, municipal waste and coal. Those briquettes would be created in local areas and transported to Westfield by an existing rail link.

The Scottish coal industry, at present threatened by the limited lifespan of the two remaining coal-burning power stations in Scotland, could have a new life. A large number of jobs would be created in the construction process and on a permanent basis, and security of energy supply would be established. A fully developed Westfield site of four or five gasifiers would produce as much energy as one nuclear power station, and there would be a huge benefit to the balance of payments—we would no longer need to pay foreign suppliers for gas, coal and oil.

The scheme would provide an opportunity for politicians to work together, whether in Westminster, Brussels, Holyrood or locally. Perhaps we should take a leaf from the book of the United States, where the Energy Policy Act of 2005, passed by Congress in July, offers 80 per cent. loan guarantees and 50 per cent. grants to kick-start the first gasifiers. After that, financial institutions will provide loans, because they will have seen the technology at work. It will cost £50 million to build the first gasifier at Westfield. That sounds like a lot, but it is not, because the company is not asking Government for a grant; it merely wants them to act as guarantor.

In the 1970s and early 1980s British Gas had the vision to spend £1 billion at today's prices developing the technology, having predicted exactly the circumstances in which we now find ourselves. We have the opportunity to exploit that vision and, in the process, to plug the energy gap, meet environmental targets and make good use of waste.

Next year's energy review offers us an opportunity to look to the future. We should take it. Projects such as the one that I have mentioned deserve every incentive and every encouragement, and should be put firmly on the political agenda. They represent a serious way forward. If they provide an alternative to nuclear power, surely pure coal technology and pure development technology deserve every chance to be invested in, encouraged and taken forward so that they can help to meet the energy needs of the country.

We have spent a lot of time talking about the negative sides of energy and nuclear power. Let us base our agenda not on what we are against, but on what we are for, and not on what we cannot do, but on what we can do. I have suggested one way in which we can go about that. I intend to take the matter up with my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy. I hope that he will reflect on what has been said this evening, and will take it into account in his future consideration of the issues.

4.59 pm

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I must declare an interest in connection with the oil and gas industry—it is in the Register of Members' Interests. I join other Members in congratulating the Chair of the Scottish Affairs Committee on securing the debate and on his presentation of his Committee's report; it has been most enlightening. I also thank the noble Baroness who chaired the Committee in the previous Parliament. She served this House well in that capacity and her contribution was much appreciated.

I understand that the report was cut short by the election and that it does not, therefore, discuss fully some of the matters on which evidence was taken. Perhaps the Committee will be able to do more in this Parliament, although it seems that most Select Committees are now concentrating on energy.

5 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

5.15 pm

On resuming—

Sir Robert Smith: I think we may have lost a few people during that Division. I wanted to get back to the context of where the Committee started and a point raised by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Doran); the shift in the amount of gas coming from the UK continental shelf. The hon. Gentleman made a powerful point. There is great danger in thinking that it is no longer a major industry because we are getting slightly less. We must not lose sight of how important the industry is in contributing to the UK economy and to our supply needs.

It seems evidently sensible, in looking at our energy supply, to look at the existing one—which has done so much for the country already—and make sure that we do nothing to damage it. We should maximise its potential in the years to come. To that end, the strongest message that the Minister can ultimately give today is that the Chancellor plans to do nothing on Monday to frighten off vital investment. One question we might ask, given that we have found gas supplies dwindling slightly sooner than expected, is about past levels of investment in exploration and production. What may have happened is that the Chancellor frightened off investors three years ago with a surprise tax change.

It is extremely important, in managing the tax system of an industry that makes such a contribution—in tax revenue, as the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North outlined, in supply of gas, and in jobs and investment—that nothing is done to frighten that investment off with a surprise windfall tax. If the Minister can take that message back to the Treasury to reinforce it in its mind, it would do much to improve the chances of investment.

Scotland's energy, which we are looking at, is part of the UK system. One of the two gas issues which urgently need to be addressed—as well as thinking long-term—is the need both for more storage in the United Kingdom system and for the European market to be genuinely liberal. The market failures identified by the Commission need to be tackled. With the Energy Council on today, can the Minister update us as to what the Government have been trying to do to achieve the liberalisation they claim to want to see?

The North Sea links well to the other part; an issue which several members, most recently the hon. Member for Glenrothes (Mr. MacDougall) have raised. That is the future of coal in our economy. We must not lose the potential for the North sea to be a storage for carbon sequestrated from the burning of coal, or from coal gasification. The North sea infrastructure is extremely important to that being maintained, and for gearing that investment.

We have heard about the exciting Miller project; taking gas, removing the carbon, burning the hydrogen, exporting the electricity to the grid and putting the sequestrated carbon back offshore to enhance oil recovery. That can be done to enhance oil recovery, but the problem that we face under the OSPAR conventions is that storing CO_2 underground looks difficult at the moment. Regulations, burdens and international agreements should not stand in the way of this vital part of re-establishing carbon as a safe fuel, one to use without a global warming impact. Can the Minister outline what the Government are doing to prepare that ground? If we can establish carbon sequestration, our coal resources become an environmentally friendly, indigenous resource for our economy. As has been said already, an extremely important technology would be developed with major export potential.

While other countries may be looking at nuclear to a certain extent, China is looking at coal with a vengeance. It has so much coal on its doorstep, and is desperate for new energy sources as it grows its economy. A briefing that we had from BP at the all-party oil and gas group showed that China is already surpassing the incentives coming from Europe to look at that technology. It is dealing directly with that industry and is excited about it, because the Chinese Government recognise that global warming can have a major impact on their own economy, with such low-lying areas.

So the coal industry is an important one, and not to be forgotten. We need to unlock its potential. It should be recognised that coal is not going to go away worldwide as a major fuel. If we do not tackle the carbon emission problem, we shall have a serious environmental impact upon the world. Therefore that technology has to come forward.

Another crucial thing, if we are looking at energy supply concerns, is the reduction in demand. Energy efficiency must be at the top of our agenda in trying to tackling this balancing act over energy sources. In warm homes week in Scotland, this week, I was helping to install cavity wall and loft insulation in a constituent's house in Westhill. I took two things away from that. One is that with that many of the schemes we have used we may now have done many of the easy houses. We need more innovative ways of putting insulation into our housing stock and, as hon. Members have said, ensuring that new housing stock meets high environmental standards.

Perhaps the Minister will enlighten the House on how many more people will suffer fuel poverty this winter because of higher fuel prices. Some estimates suggest that 1.5 million people in the UK will be taken back into fuel poverty because of high energy prices. That shows the importance of energy efficiency and a reduction in demand in tackling fuel poverty instead of just relying on low energy prices. If we can improve the housing stock in this country, people will still be able to keep themselves warm without major expenditure when they move or their circumstances change.

The Committee's fifth recommendation referred to the Scottish Executive's demand and perhaps the Minister will be able to confirm what it will be, although it is for the Scottish Executive to decide how they will implement their renewable commitment. I understand that they have decided to measure it in terms of 6 GWe when interpreting how they meet the 40 per cent. target. Perhaps the Minister would confirm that.

Transmission charging has been raised and, again, perhaps the Minister could enlighten us on the Government's response to Ofgem inviting the National Grid Company to undertake further work on these aspects and to consult on possible improvements during the next couple of years. What exactly has Ofgem asked the National Grid Company to look at? A target date of the next couple of years for dealing with problems with the transmission system is rather vague.

Perhaps the Minister would reinforce what the Committee said about not just the islands but more rural and peripheral parts of the transmission network on the mainland having the cap extended. The highlands need to be able to export what they produce and the national grid charging system should not be a barrier.

The hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) made a point about biomass. It is attractive not just because it is a continually renewable non-carbon production system, but because it can underpin a rural economy that is going through major changes in the common agricultural policy and the way in which we support our rural economies by providing new outlets for what we can grow and new ways of supporting the forestry industry when forest thinnings are not finding a good market. That makes a big difference.

The private Member's Bill of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) could create the power for Ministers to use renewable heat obligations to try to drive biomass forward. The hon. Gentleman is seeking to give Ministers the power to do that. Ministers south of the border say that they do not want that power, but if Ministers north of the border want it, will the Minister explain how the Government intend to respond to that private Member's Bill and recognise that enabling legislation would at least put another tool in the box to encourage renewables?

Other forms of renewables have been discussed. The Danes and others have stolen the economic benefit of the onshore wind power industry by getting in first, but we still have the potential to be a major player in offshore wind, wave and tidal energy. We have the skills from North sea sub-sea technology which the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North talked about. Those skills are transferable to other aspects of working offshore. The exciting Pelamis project is unfortunately going to produce electricity for the Portuguese. Full-size wave-generation equipment is being built in my constituency and a tangible industry is beginning to build up. The Government must take that on board.

The Committee looked at the Dounreay work force but we have not discussed them much in this debate. The country made a major change to the Caithness economy when Dounreay went there and we have a moral obligation to deal with the decommissioning consequences for jobs and the economy there.

We should continue to support fusion research internationally. The report says that the debate should not be about nuclear versus renewables and, in an ideal world, it should not, but as the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North showed us, there is a concern that the history shows that that was a problem in the past. We must be mindful of the signals that are sent to the market when the Government say that they want to start up the nuclear industry again and of whether the investment in renewables that is finally beginning to take off will be starved as the market starts to realise that there is another outlook.

We also need to consider the legacy of nuclear waste and the £50 billion that we are using to clean up the current public-sector liability in relation to nuclear. Imagine what we could have done if that money had been invested in alternative sources of energy. Nuclear is the only source of power with its own police force. That sends a signal about some of the security issues and concerns that still need to be addressed.

There is much to be done in the future. If we can cut demand and ensure that we have the right climate for investment in maximising renewables, that we do not damage the full potential of the North sea and that we open up to the recognition of the markets around the world for clean coal technology and carbon sequestration, we have the potential to meet our energy needs, get our security of supply, improve our environmental impact, and develop our export industry and vital new jobs for the Scottish economy.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): I apologise on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing), the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland. She has been involved with the Committee on the Equality Bill, so I have the privilege of taking her place. I have a great affection for the Scottish Affairs Committee because I was put on it the moment that I was elected to the House and served on it for five years; basically, on the basis that my constituency has a border with Scotland, which, in the Conservative party, immediately makes one eligible to join the Scottish Affairs Committee. The other thing to do is to have a Scottish name and then one is guaranteed to be put on it straight away.

I commend the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Sarwar)—his constituency used to be known as Glasgow Govan, but sadly we have to call it Glasgow, Central these days—and the Committee on their very good report. The visit of members of the Committee to Dounreay—obviously they suddenly realised that there was a much bigger issue in relation to energy supplies in Scotland and indeed the United Kingdom—prompted the report. I appreciate that it was a short report because of the general election.

I do not think that anybody could disagree with recommendation 1. It is right for the Government to have an audit of energy resources and to produce a plan of what they propose for the future. Interestingly, the response from the Government on 25 October was anodyne, to say the least, but, lo and behold, just a few days later—at the CBI; not in Parliament, of course—the Prime Minister announced the energy review. The official Opposition welcomed that. We have had eight years of vacillation on this issue. Secretaries of State have come and gone and each appeared to have a different view of what energy requirements should be. The issue has been allowed to drift and the Government have been pushed between the green lobby, the nuclear lobby and coal lobby without making their mind up.

The situation is now urgent. The hon. Member for Lanark and Hamilton, East (Mr. Hood)—as I now have to call him—put things very clearly in relation to Scotland. Curiously, there appear to be differences in the figures showing what proportion of fuel provides what energy. However, the fact of the matter is that, with the vast majority of Scotland's energy coming from both nuclear and coal—which are going to run down—if nothing is done urgently, there will be a major problem, not just in Scotland, but in the United Kingdom as a whole. I suspect that one of the reasons why the Prime Minister launched his initiative when he did is because he realised the lesson that history has taught him: Governments who let the lights go out soon get dismissed from power. These days, with the whole of our economy dependent on energy, that would be a complete economic disaster for this country.

I take issue with something that the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith) said. He talked about a reduction in demand. Of course, it is important that individual householders insulate their houses and make them more economic in terms of energy use, but the reality is that energy use will go up. Energy use, and electricity use in particular, has been increasing exponentially, one year after the other. Following the big bang in the City of London, energy use went up by 20 per cent. because of the need for air conditioning to cool servers and so on. Every new commercial building will now have air conditioning, which creates more demand. We have to expect a growing demand for electricity and power in the future.

Sir Robert Smith: It is still possible to do things in a more efficient way. If the hon. Gentleman considers the way that the economy has grown and the growth in energy demand, he will see that the economy has managed to grow far faster than the demand for energy. There is a lesson there about what happens when we make the right decisions. A building like Portcullis House does not use air conditioning; it has a more efficient system of cooling. There are ways to do that.

Mr. Atkinson: I agree but, globally, I predict that demand will continue to rise at a rate of 2 or 3 per cent. a year.

I would like to deal with various issues that were raised. My two colleagues sounded great enthusiasm for nuclear power, as did the hon. Member for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson). I agree; there is opposition to it, but we should explore all possibilities. Renewables will play a role and clean coal technology is extremely important, as several hon. Members have said. This country is sitting on a great mound of coal and we cannot ignore that resource.

In the end, however, it comes down to what we do about nuclear. It is becoming evident that we need to replace the nuclear power stations that are going to close if we are to maintain the nuclear share of energy output in Scotland. The power station in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) at Chapelcross would make an ideal site for a replacement station.

Attending the meeting of the all-party group on energy last night, I was able to talk to some nuclear engineers on the subject. The interesting thing about the new AP1000 generators is that they are much smaller and two could be placed on some of the sites of existing nuclear power stations. Setting aside the planning position, I also learned that new power stations could generate power three years from the day that the first sod was cut. That is a shorter time scale than those we have talked about in the past. It runs the risk of planning difficulties, which would be ameliorated if new stations were put on existing sites where there is already a work force and people are used to having a nuclear power station in place.

On wind energy, if we consider all the outstanding applications in Scotland, the whole of the country would be covered in wind farms. I agree with many people who have deep reservations about that form of renewable energy. It is not just a question of the damage that it can do to the landscape, but the concerns that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds recently outlined. I read the other day that it was very concerned about the huge wind farm plan for the Isle of Lewis, which will chop up golden eagles at the rate of four a day, if I read the report right. There are real concerns about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale mentioned biomass. He has a new biomass power station in Lockerbie in his constituency. That is to be encouraged because it helps the forestry industry to get rid of its surplus capacity. As always, there are two sides to this story and one of the problems with the Lockerbie power station is that it will predominantly be using woodchips to start with. Woodchips are destined for a large factory in my constituency, which will now have to pay much more for them because the renewables obligation means that the purchase of woodchip in Lockerbie will be effectively subsidised. It is never very easy to square the circle with regard to energy issues.

The Minister has to reply and we want to hear from him, but I shall say one last thing. There is a problem with the transmission arrangements and a review of those is somewhat urgent. There is a sort of illogic, whereby a power station at Peterhead has to pay £18 a kilowatt to transmit, while one in the south of England receives a bonus for generating. The Scottish Executive are talking about a subsidy—to put it that way—for the connectors to the islands, but nonsense is beginning to brew up in this situation and it ought to be addressed. It is important that Scottish power stations are not put at a disadvantage as far as other power stations in the United Kingdom are concerned because there is a good legacy of engineering skills and knowledge in Scotland that we would not want to be lost.

5.35 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): May I begin by joining the chorus of congratulations for the Chairman and members of the Scottish Affairs Committee on securing the opportunity for us to debate energy issues in the Scottish context? I join the Chairman in thanking Baroness Adams of Somewhere in Paisley. [HON. MEMBERS: "Craigielea."] A fine place. I also thank the Committee members, and I join the Chairman in paying tribute to John Lyons and Peter Duncan, who made a significant contribution to the report.

There is zero prospect of me addressing many, if any, of the points raised in the debate, or the specific questions asked, in the fewer than nine minutes remaining. However, the report has drawn sharp attention to many important aspects of the problems facing us in Scotland when we consider our future energy policy. As has been said, the Government have formally responded to the Committee's specific recommendations and I shall speak about some of those in a moment.

The debate gives Parliament its first opportunity to discuss energy matters since my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced the energy review earlier this week. It is particularly fitting that this first debate should focus on energy policy relating to Scotland, given the importance of energy matters—ranging from those involving the North sea to our great renewables potential—in Scottish life. We have heard many excellent speeches, which reflected the variety of the issues across Scotland, from the south-west to Orkney and Shetland, and to the Western Isles and so on.

Mr. Joyce: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Beauly-Denny power line—Denny is in my Falkirk constituency—is fundamental to the future of renewables in Scotland? Scottish Power and the Scottish and Southern Energy Group proposed a sound project that minimises the environmental risk and has considerable support in my constituency.

David Cairns: My hon. Friend is right. The planning decision for the Beauly-Denny line rests with Scottish Executive Ministers, but it is clear that if one is going to generate renewable energy from sources in the far north of Scotland, or on the isles, it has to get to market somehow. Various ways of doing that have been suggested, including undergrounding, higher pylons and sub-sea cables. Those are matters for the Scottish Ministers. However, there is no getting away from the fact that it is essential to have some way of getting the electricity from where it is generated to the market. My hon. Friend is a strong supporter of the Beauly-Denny upgrade.

We have heard uniformly excellent speeches from my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Sarwar), for Glasgow, North-West (John Robertson), for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Doran), for Midlothian (Mr. Hamilton), for Glenrothes (Mr. MacDougall) and for Lanark and Hamilton, East (Mr. Hood). There were speeches of variable content from the hon. Members for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell), for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett), for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander), for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker), for Angus (Mr. Weir), for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith) and for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson). The points that they made stand for themselves. I am sure that this debate will be drawn to the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and those responsible for the conduct of the energy review, about which I shall speak in a moment.

On the energy scene last winter, the Committee identified the fundamental significance of the UK becoming a net importer of gas. As my hon. Friend the Member for Lanark and Hamilton, East said, we have been talking about that for many years, but it has not sunk into people's thinking. The Committee mentioned that last winter, but now it is significantly on the agenda and is one of the major factors behind the decision to have an energy review.

The Committee noted—this has been echoed in contributions today—the potential closure of much nuclear and coal-fired generating plant in coming years in Scotland, the cost pressures on remaining large-scale plants in Scotland and the challenges to be faced in bringing renewable generation forward. The importance of those challenges across the country was fundamental to the Prime Minister's announcement of the energy review.

I will not flatter the Committee unnecessarily by saying that its report was a trigger for the energy review, but undoubtedly the issues that it addressed and identified with great perspicacity also contributed, in the wider body politic, to the review's announcement.

The review will build on the goals set out in the 2003 White Paper, look at the supply and demand for energy beyond 2010 and consider the role of all forms of generation—gas, coal and nuclear. It will look at various renewables and consider the new technological opportunities of carbon capture. It will also—this is vital—consider transport and energy efficiency.

Mr. Sarwar: We have huge coal reserves in the UK, so coal must play a part in our future strategy. I understand that Scottish and UK coal are high in sulphur, so flue gas desulphurisation equipment will have to be fitted to plants. Will the Minister give a commitment that the Government will underwrite that cost to the coal industry?

David Cairns: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced the review on Tuesday, and on Thursday afternoon my hon. Friend is looking for the answers. I cannot give him that commitment. I understand that the cost of installing such equipment is very high. As a result of the energy review, and when all the issues have been considered in the round, such a case may be made, but I am not in a position to give such an assurance at this stage.

The energy review will go a long way towards meeting the first recommendation in the Committee's report, which is that the "Government undertake an audit of the energy resources that are currently available, and then . . . use that as a basis to work out the energy requirements that will be needed in the future."

As we have explained in the past couple of days, the context for energy policy has moved on in various ways since the White Paper was published almost three years ago. There is now overwhelming evidence of the nature of climate change, which we have not spoken about much in this debate. I believe that everyone accepts it as a given. No one is arguing that it is not happening, so we are considering the next stage. The evidence for climate change and the impact that that has on public policy are overwhelming.

Oil and gas prices have risen rise steeply—my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North made that point—and demand from the developing economies of China and India has increased. That has been referred to repeatedly by hon. Members, as has concern about the future security of UK energy supplies. Those things coming together mean that energy policy is back on the agenda with a vengeance, as the Prime Minister said on Tuesday. He spoke of the feverish rethinking that is taking place around the world on this paramount issue.

The review will consider the options for moving towards the goals set out in the energy White Paper. It will not be a nuclear review, or a review of a single technology. It must be about ensuring that we make the best use of a mix of technologies and sources of energy, and that we continue to press for greater efficiency in the use of energy. That point came up towards the end of the debate.

Inevitably, difficult decisions—or unpopular decisions, in some quarters—and trade-offs will have to be made. The Government intend to stimulate informed debates such as—all joking aside—the highly informed debate that we have had this afternoon. It is important that the debate move out from this Chamber to the whole of Scotland: it must engage the public, the business community, industry, academics, the private sector, non-governmental organisations and other experts, as well as members of the public. The Scotland Office and the Scottish Executive are already engaged with the review team, which is based at the Department of Trade and Industry. We will continue to engage with it, and, in the next six months or so, take forward many issues that have been mentioned today and in the Select Committee report.

Energy policy is mainly reserved to the UK Government, but many important aspects are devolved. The Executive will rightly have considerable interest in such matters. The Government fully recognise the importance of the Executive and the other devolved Administrations in energy policy issues, and we are committed to engaging with them during the review.

It is in everyone's interest to have a continuing dialogue in areas with a strong Scottish dimension. As with other aspects of ongoing energy policy, close contact between Whitehall and the Executive and an understanding of each other's concerns are important to securing the best outcome for Scotland and for the UK. Throughout the public consultation that will be launched at the turn of the year, we will make every effort to ensure that views in Scotland are fed into the review and taken into account in the recommendations. A series of events are planned to explain the review process and to hear the views of people in all parts of the country.

Question put and agreed to.

[MISS ANN WIDDECOMBE in the Chair]

Bovine TB

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Cawsey.]

9.30 am

Mr. Geoffrey Cox (Torridge and West Devon) (Con): I am very grateful and delighted to have secured this debate at a time when the subject is so topical. The effects of bovine tuberculosis in my constituency, across the south-west and throughout the country are becoming a subject of increasing public notice. Between January 1996 and August 2005, 123,800 cattle were compulsorily slaughtered as a result of bovine TB. In 2003–04, bovine TB cost the United Kingdom £88 million. The figure was £92 million in 2004–05, and I understand that it will be similar this year. The incidence of the disease in cattle is rising at an annual long-term rate of 18 per cent. According to the Government, if the disease continues to spread at the present rate, the number of slaughters will rise from the present level of 23,000 a year to 66,000 a year in just five years and the annual costs of testing and compensation alone will be £145 million.

Last year in my county of Devon, there were 396 new-herd incidents. However, I have been given access to the state veterinary service figures for 1 January to 1 December 2005, and they are shocking. The number of new-herd breakdowns in Devon has gone up from 396 last year to 669 in just those 11 months. The number of reactors slaughtered has risen to 6,056 and the number of slaughterhouse cases is 99. That increase from 396 to 669 in the number of confirmed new-herd incidents in Devon represents a rise of nearly 70 per cent. If anything demonstrates clearly that the economic cost to the country of bovine tuberculosis and its present almost uncontrolled spread is becoming financially unsustainable regionally and nationally, it is those figures. They are a call for action from the Government.

I know that the Government have not been entirely idle, and it would be wrong to suggest that the Minister's Department has been doing nothing. There are programmes afoot to look into the question of vaccination and to examine the efficacy of different tests. At the heart of the Government's policy—the subject on which I wish chiefly to dwell—have been the random badger culling trials, which concluded just a week ago.

The human costs of bovine TB, let alone the financial costs, have long been unsustainable. Bovine TB has a slow attritional effect on the morale of farming families. One in five calls to the rural stress information network—to whose work I pay handsome tribute—arises as a result of the direct or indirect effects of bovine tuberculosis. Each of us who lives in rural communities knows that the disease has many farming families in its seemingly relentless grip and we know of the strain that that imposes.

As well as the human costs, however, there are the economic costs. The Exeter university report in May concluded that "there is little disagreement that the total cost of a TB incident generally exceeds payments for the livestock slaughtered."

I must tell the Minister that those effects will be exacerbated by the Government's proposals to introduce tabular valuations. The university of Reading found that 79 per cent. of dairy farmers and 65 per cent. of beef farmers suffered net losses from TB breakdowns of up to £17,000 per farm. Therefore, it is incumbent on all hon. Members, especially the Minister and the Department, to examine carefully the assumptions on which current policy is based. For some eight years, random badger culling trials have been at the heart of those assumptions. I wish to examine those trials. In 1997, Professor Krebs's commission found:

"There is strong circumstantial evidence to suggest that badgers represent a significant source of mycobacterium bovis infection in cattle".

Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): I apologise that, due to other commitments, I must leave early. Having set up the Krebs commission when I was a Minister, I can tell the Chamber that the intention of the last Conservative Government was that the Krebs report should identify radical change to deal with this matter. That was eight years ago.

Mr. Cox: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention because that is precisely what I wish to address. What was the purpose of the Krebs trials? What was their function? Professor Krebs never doubted that the badger represented a significant source of infection in cattle. He said that the strongest evidence came from the four cases in large areas of high herd breakdown incidents where herd breakdown rates were lower following badger removal. That evidence has been amply confirmed this year in the Republic of Ireland's four-areas trial, to which I shall return.

The Krebs trials were initiated with the principal aim of determining, if possible, not the qualitative contribution—not the fact that the badger was an influence in the spread of the disease—but the quantitative contribution, and the effectiveness of various methods of culling. Professor Krebs did not argue, nor, to my knowledge, has any sensible commentator ever argued, that the presence of infected wildlife was the only factor in the epidemiology of the disease. The question that no science has apparently yet been able to answer is that of extent.

The advice to the Government of the Science Advisory Council sub-group on bovine TB just two months ago was that the relative roles of cattle transmission and wildlife are still impossible to determine. However, it concluded that, in the current circumstances, cattle-to-cattle transmission was probably the dominant factor. It is important to be careful in examining what that might mean. The geographical spread of bovine TB within the UK may well be currently influenced by cattle movements.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): Would my hon. Friend care to reflect on the fact that, during the foot and mouth outbreak when there were no cattle movements, TB still continued its spread across the country through some other medium?

Mr. Cox: I fully agree, but my intention at the moment is to examine the review of the Government's advice and the status of their thinking. For now, I shall not deal with whether I agree with the conclusions of the Science Advisory Council; I shall come to that at the end. I am examining the way in which the policy has developed within the Department, and I ask the Minister whether some of the assumptions that I am making and whether some of the inferences that I am drawing from the published material are incorrect.

I do not believe that the Minister or the Department dispute that whether cattle transmission totals 50 per cent., 60 per cent., 40 per cent. or more or less than that, the presence of a pool of infection within this country's wildlife—particularly in hot spots such as Devon—is a significant source of infection. I am fortified in that statement by correspondence from the Minister, which has been given to me by my constituent, Mr. Tony Yewdall. His family farm lost some 90 cattle over a period of two years, and I know that the Minister is familiar with Mr. Yewdall. In that extensive correspondence, the Minister did not seek to deny that the badger is a significant source of infection and likely to be implicated in the breakdown on the Yewdalls's farm, which, in common with many in the same predicament in my constituency, operates a closed herd.

Let us consider the Krebs trials. Will they be an effective way to determine the effectiveness of the culling and the quantitative contribution of the badger? Professor Godfray, who was commissioned by the Government to examine and inspect the Krebs trials, has concluded that they will not prove anything conclusive about the effectiveness of culling. Indeed, Professor Bourne, chairman of the Independent Scientific Group, told the Select Committee in 2004 that the trials' validity would apply only to the cull in the specific manner in which it was done in them.

There are at least serious doubts about the manner in which culling has been carried out in the suspended reactive and proactive triplet areas. In an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) on 8 December 2003, the Minister accepted that, in the poorest conditions, culling efficiency might be as low as 30 per cent. and it remains far below the 100 per cent. advised as essential by Professor Krebs if significant conclusions were to be drawn.

In his original report, Professor Krebs recommended that the reactive trial should involve the removal of "all badgers, including lactating sows, from all social groups from territories including the breakdown farm."

He went on to stipulate

"sufficient follow-up to ensure that every member of every social group which could have caused the initial breakdown has been removed" and that recolonisation of setts should be prevented for a reasonable period. There are strong grounds for believing that none of those conditions has been met. The Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons has pertinently observed of that failure:

"If the object is to control a disease by slaughtering potentially infected animals in a defined area, it is optimistic to expect this to work when a substantial proportion of them survive to spread the disease."

The importance of achieving 100 per cent. efficiency, which Professor Krebs initially regarded as crucial to the effectiveness of the trials, was emphasised by Mr. Alick Simmons, the head of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs's veterinary endemic animal disease and zoonoses division. In his evidence to the Select Committee in May 2004, he said:

"I think we have had a series of analyses done by various different scientists which show that if you remove all of the badgers from a particular area, then the effect of that on the incidence in cattle is quite dramatic, and I do not think there is any suggestion that we would consider anything else."

Thus there are serious questions about the effectiveness of the Krebs trials but, to conclude the trials, farmers throughout the country and in the south-west have been told endlessly to wait.

The badger population is currently estimated at well over 500,000. It has enjoyed protected status for many years and is not threatened. Indeed, the badger's status, given its lack of endangerment, is unique. That is entirely right. The badger is a unique and beautiful animal and occupies an affectionate place in the hearts of the British people. Gratuitous cruelty to animals is a disgusting practice and deserves the opprobrium and contempt that it receives when it is discovered. But bovine TB is a killer of badgers, too. Those with the disease can die a gruesome and harrowing death. I have read accounts by scientists of its pathology. A recent article by Dr. John Gallagher described the lungs of a diseased badger:

"But whilst in cattle very few bacilli are found in these destructive lesions the opposite occurs in badgers. As badger lesions mature vast numbers of bacilli can accumulate as necrosis gradually increases. Occasionally, massive colonisation can be seen in the tubules of damaged nephrons giving the appearance of a broth" within the lungs of the infected animal. In parts of the country such as Devon, bovine TB is endemic in the badger population. We have a responsibility to deal with it in both the cattle and the wildlife population to the ultimate benefit of both.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): Unfortunately I, too, have to leave before the end of the debate. In the southern part of my constituency which borders on that of my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), we have a hot spot in the Audlem and Market Drayton area. It first appeared during the foot and mouth crisis, which rather reinforces the point that was made earlier. Does my hon. Friend recognise the need for a systematic testing of road kills, particularly in the light of the evidence he has just cited, because they are one of the best available sources of evidence to show the spread of TB and how it may not just be the result of cattle transmission?

Mr. Cox: I could not agree with my hon. Friend more. It is obviously vital that all instruments and tools available to us should be examined and expanded. I understand that the recent figures show that one in seven badgers from the road traffic accident testing were infected. Plainly we need to look at those tests much more carefully and expand the testing if possible.

On the strength of the Krebs trials, which the chairman of the Independent Scientific Group on cattle TB described as "of limited application", there has until recently been no development of a coherent and comprehensive strategy for the reduction and elimination of the disease that includes the vital wildlife factor. It is not surprising that events are reaching the pass that the statistics are showing.

Yet I do not want to paint a wholly gloomy picture. For on to this dark horizon, there came a ray of light. It seemed as if at last, for the Government and the Minister, the reality, although long obscured, had begun to dawn. There was the Government's strategic framework for the sustainable control of bovine tuberculosis. Many deride that document, regarding it as something that, after eight long years, is full of pious sentiments promising little in the way of immediate action. However, in the spirit that I intend to adopt for the purposes of this debate of trying to credit constructive action where credit is due, I do not think that all the criticisms are necessarily merited.

Having spent the last eight years in the pursuit of sound science based on the random badger culling trials, the framework acknowledges, just as Professor Godfray had warned over 18 months before:

"In this area, scientific results are always likely to be subject to debate and variable interpretation.

Decisions may have to be made taking account of scientific uncertainty. In considering the evidence on badger controls, we will, as well as assessing the scientific merits of options, need to focus on costs, practicality of delivery, conservation implications, and take in to account wider public opinion.

Partnership was essential to an effective strategy. There was to be an annual conference of stakeholders. A new national advisory body and a regionally tailored approach according to disease incidence and risk. Thus where there were areas of grave and intense infection, different measures might be called for.

There was to be an overall approach to the problem. Piecemeal solutions were to be rejected in favour of a combination of measures to tackle the disease that would encompass pre-movement testing, animal husbandry and measures to reduce the incidence of bTB in wildlife".

I do not believe that anybody could seriously object to any of the sentiments outlined in the framework document. Partnership: yes. We can also say yes to an overall, comprehensive approach that deals with both cattle and wildlife transmission. We can also say yes to a regionally tailored approach designed to target those areas where the infection is at its most intense, because in those areas there will be one risk assessment and in the areas that are relatively or entirely clean, the risk assessment will be different. That makes sense, and I understand it.

I also understand the other sentiments in the document, which states:

"How we tackle the threat from the wildlife reservoir, particularly badgers, is difficult to resolve scientifically."

It has taken the Government eight years to arrive at the conclusion that the science will not prove anything and that we shall have to proceed on the basis of scientific uncertainty. I applaud them if they have genuinely recognised that we shall have to use the best available evidence and assess risks in different areas, knowing that we cannot foresee the precise effects of the treatment that we prescribe in a particular area. As the document says,

"Scientific certainty and consensus are not always achievable. We need to find the means of interpreting science when there is conflicting advice."

I have to tell the Minister that it is his job to make such judgments. As the document says:

"Sometimes decisions need to be made on the basis of the best available scientific evidence and in the light of outstanding uncertainty."

The document then adds:

"It is important not to exclude the possibility of continuing to seek to control bTB through cattle based measures alone . . . In the case of bTB around 24,000 cattle are slaughtered each year to help control the disease, causing hardship to farmers and economic costs to Government and industry. We would not expect a limited/localised badger culling policy to be popular across the whole of society".

Finally, the document spoke of equity:

"Government must ensure that costs of controls are fairly distributed amongst beneficiaries. This is particularly sensitive given the existence of a wildlife reservoir of disease that is not currently controlled by Government (due to the uncertainty of the evidence) and that farmers are not permitted to control themselves."

In other words, the strategic document contained the clearest concession that there is an issue of equity and of basic, fundamental fairness in expecting the farming community to bear not only the cost of the pre-movement tests involved in controlling this disease, but the economic and human costs of being denied the right to defend their property and to protect themselves against a disease that, as the document said,

"farmers are not permitted to control themselves."

There is an issue about allowing this situation to continue and about loading ever more responsibilities on the farmer without tackling the wildlife reservoir of disease.

On 27 June, I attended a meeting with the Minister, along with constituents and representatives of the National Beef Association. The message from that meeting was unmistakable and was consistent with the strategic framework document, which said that it was important not to exclude the possibility of concentrating on cattle transmission alone. The interpretation of all those present was that the Government were moving slowly but ineluctably toward the inevitable conclusion. There was a lively discussion about the means by which a limited and humane cull might be carried out. The constructive engagement of the farming organisation was enlisted.

Then there was the scientific advice that the Government received. Just a few weeks ago, in September, the Science Advisory Council offered this cautious recommendation:

"Infection of cattle through cattle-to-cattle transmission and from wildlife reservoirs may occur in parallel. Where this occurs, both routes may need to be addressed for effective control . . . the results of the Irish Four Areas trial are unlikely to be directly and quantitatively applicable to mainland GB but provide strong evidence that in some circumstances proactive culling may provide a substantial contribution to control . . . culling may contribute to an effective control strategy in some heavily infected and geographically distinct and isolated areas, but only when coupled with other control measures."

It explained that the efficacy of culling would depend on local and geographical factors. Those are the very issues with which the national and regional policy sketched out in the strategic framework is concerned; hence the need for regionally tailored policies.

Finally, we have had consistent assurances from the Minister since the summer—repeated in this House—that an announcement could be expected in the autumn. I am willing to call December autumn if he will make his announcement now. Timing does not matter—as we know, we can suspend it in the House—so I shall be delighted if he will do so. I plead with him to show the members of farming communities who have travelled a great distance to attend this debate that although the Government are moving slowly, they are going to take precise and specific action. Last month, the Minister said:

"I expect that some of the announcements that we will make later this autumn will be about what more can be done to prevent the spread of TB between cattle as well as how we may address the wildlife problem."—[Official Report, 17 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 1089.]

All those statements, and the whole current of Government policy, seem to have been leading to a measured response to the problem of uncertain evidence and the long- neglected right of farming people to have their livelihoods and property protected in a manner in which they can have confidence. I accept that it is essential to assess risk and cost when considering that necessary buzzword in administrative law—what is "proportionate". The Minister has repeatedly said that that is what he is engaged in.

As the Government concede, however, in a genuine partnership, basic considerations of equity and fairness are at stake. Why should farming communities have to bear the cost of new cattle control measures, such as pre-movement testing, reduced compensation and the continuing and dramatic losses and effects of BTB while unable to protect themselves, their living and their animals from the reservoir of disease that everybody accepts exists? A limited resumption of culling must be available as a tool in any co-ordinated and comprehensive policy if it is veterinary opinion that circumstances on the ground call for it.

I accept that the Minister's Department has the spectre of a High Court judge looking over its shoulder, but I ask him to consider the terms of section 10(2) of the Protection of Badgers Act 1992:

"A licence may be granted to any person by the appropriate Minister authorising him, notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of this Act, but subject to compliance with any conditions specified in the licence—(a) for the purpose of preventing the spread of disease, to kill or take badgers, or to interfere with a badger sett".

In other words, the Act clearly permits the Minister to issue a licence for the taking or culling of badgers to prevent the spread of disease. Subsection (9) of that same section says that that consent "shall not be unreasonably withheld".

Thus, in a court, the onus would be on the Minister to prove that his consent to the licence had been reasonable.

Every farmer has rights to the peaceful enjoyment of his property under article 1 of protocol 1 of the European convention on human rights. Under the jurisprudence of that convention, a fair balance must be struck between the individual and the interests of society in protecting the badger. It was never the intention of Parliament that farming communities should be denied the opportunity of dealing with the wildlife reservoir if there were a prospect that that might be effective. Given that the Government seem to be unprepared to act even in the extreme circumstances described in the SAC's advice, a blanket policy denying all applications for a licence would stand a strong chance of being found to be unlawful. I hope that such action will be unnecessary.

Only the week before last, the Farmers Guardian announced that the Department had stated that the Minister's announcement could be expected today, so we have arrived at the end of a long and tortuous road—or have we? What new twist of the screw or the knife is to be inflicted on an anxious and expectant farming community? There are worrying developments, with which I ask the Minister to deal. In January 2006, the new EU food hygiene regulations come into force, which will require that dairy producers isolate and discard milk from TB reactor cows. What will that mean for producers in the south-west, where large herd breakdowns take place? We are in December, but there is no guidance from DEFRA on how to deal with the situation.

If there is to be a partnership, let there be genuine and greater flexibility to enable farmers to recover more quickly from a breakdown. Allow them to volunteer inconclusive reactors for slaughter. Where there are large herd losses, use the gamma interferon test to accelerate the diagnosis of infected cattle, and allow fast restocking. Where whole herds are removed—as has tragically been the case in my constituency and other constituencies throughout the south-west—if cattle-to-cattle transmission is the cause, fast restocking should be allowed after disinfection.

The feeling of the farming communities whom I represent is running very strong. They are law-abiding, courageous and decent people whom it is a privilege to represent, but they are at the end of their tether. They are stretched in every direction by one pressure on another and they cannot endure indefinitely. The human cost and misery of the tragedy, unfolding silently, unnoticed by a wider public, throughout the countryside, can no longer be ignored. If the Government fail to fulfil the hopes of an expectant farming community that, at last, pragmatic considerations have prevailed, they will rightly think that Nero himself could not have shown more shocking indifference to the fate of farmers, cattle and badgers alike.

I have received many letters on this subject from constituents—farmers, vets and others who have witnessed the burdens placed by bovine TB on farming families. I shall read only one. Mr. R. E. Colbear of Northlew near Okehampton says:

"I am writing as a farmer in the community and one who is at the present time under TB restriction. Since 1996 I have been shut down in my livestock business for BSE, F&M"— foot and mouth—

"and now TB. On all 3 occasions the value of my livestock has decreased and my business activities have been either severely restricted or stopped, causing inability to pay my bills and trade to the best advantage . . . There have been livestock on this farm for a very long time, but the time is getting very close when that will change and I can see a time in the near future when no livestock remain.

Are the Government going to wait until the farming community become so desperate that badgers are slaughtered wholesale and become a thing of the past or are they going to rid themselves of fear of pressure groups and act? I cannot afford to wait any longer.

I have sought all my life to live an upright life according to Christian principles and shall continue to do so, but respect for government is waning fast.

More laws do not make people more law-abiding but more devious. If we do not see righteousness at the head of government, righteousness will not be in the nation.

Perhaps you could convey my circumstances to those above you in the House."

I hope that, at least in discharging that duty, I have been successful today.

10.4 am

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox) on securing the debate and on his rhetorical flourishes in advancing the case on behalf of his constituents. It is very important that we discuss agriculture and particularly livestock industries in the House, but we rarely have an opportunity to do so. It seems to me there has not been a debate on this issue in Government time since before the election before last, which speaks volumes about the importance that is now placed on what is still, for many of us in the west country particularly but also for people in other parts of the country, an important industry.

This is an emotive subject for obvious reasons. None of us wants damage to be done to the wildlife in our areas, or rash decisions to be taken in dealing with this disease. As the hon. Gentleman said, there are many uncertainties. We are still vague about the transmission and the epidemiology of the disease, despite the best endeavours of many people over a long time. We know, however, that bovine tuberculosis is present in cattle herds and in the badger population and other wildlife populations, and although we cannot yet prove definitively the transmission between the two, the link is at least logical, given trials elsewhere and the experience of many of our farmers, whose herds are closed and have not been moved on and off their farms yet who see new instances of bovine tuberculosis in them.

It is clear that the major vector is cattle to cattle; everyone should accept that. Nevertheless, it is clear that other transmission methods enable the disease to get into our cattle population. That creates problems for the economy and for the welfare of the animals. I shall deal with the economic problem in a moment, but I want to stress welfare, because this is an animal welfare issue. Some 20,000 cattle are slaughtered every year. I do not happily accept the slaughter of cattle on that scale to eradicate disease; I know the effect that it has on the farmers involved.

I also believe that this is a welfare issue for the badger population—a key issue that has only just begun to surface in the public consciousness. Why on earth are we allowing an animal that we consider to be sufficiently important to list as a protected species to suffer and die from tuberculosis without doing anything about it? This is key to disease control.

Economically, the compulsory slaughter of cattle is costing the country roughly £19 million each year, as we have already heard. That is a huge sum of money that benefits no one. We should try to eradicate the disease rather than continually deal with a recurrent infection rate. The economic effects on each farmer are enormous. The compensation that they receive for their cattle is not important. What is important is the effect on their farming enterprises and the knock-on effects of the ban on movements off their farms that cause them all sorts of short-term management and husbandry problems. There are all sorts of economic and social effects on the farmers involved.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): Has the hon. Gentleman had a case in his constituency like the one in mine, where people living in Pensax have been so intimidated by Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs officials—I have written to the Government about this—that they dare not release their cattle or even answer the phone? That is the extent of the problem, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for talking about welfare.

Mr. Heath: Some of my constituents have had very unfortunate relationships with DEFRA officials, whose response to the disease has meant that there has been no plain sailing in dealing with it. There have been delays, particularly in dealing with bureaucratic aspects, which have caused those constituents a great deal of distress and have damaged their businesses.

I have outlined the economic and social effects on the farming population. I now return to the question of welfare and the disease that is endemic in the badger population. As the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon said, it affects badgers far more than cattle. Another knock-on effect, which I shall not dwell on, is the illegal cull of badgers that is undoubtedly going on all the time. I do not condone it, but it is happening. Some of the road kills on our lanes—in Somerset, there is a dead badger on practically every lane—were not hit by cars, but were put there having been otherwise destroyed. Those are the lengths to which people will go if they feel that their concerns are not being properly addressed.

For a long time, I have advised people that they should have patience on this issue, and I have advised care and consideration for the processes that the Government have had in train. In some ways, I have defended the Government's position because I thought it important to get the scientific evidence that the Krebs trials were supposed to produce—in less time than was taken.

I have always wanted to see the holy grail of an effective vaccine for the cattle population and for other wildlife, and I am interested in the prospective trial of the BCG vaccine on badgers. If there is any evidence that it provides effective damping of the infection rate in the badger population, it should be used more extensively and quickly than is envisaged. Surely, we have learned from foot and mouth that if we get a ring of protection around infected areas and reduce the transmission of the disease within the relevant population by vaccination, we can then start to deal sensibly with the infected animals within the ring.

It seems to me that long-term considerations have outgrown their usefulness because we need to deal with the crisis on our hands that affects our farming communities and our cattle and wildlife populations. That has been emphatically brought home to many of us not only by the farmers whom we represent but by the veterinary surgeons, who have an interest in having a disease-free animal population, and who take no joy from telling people that they have to put down their cattle or take other measures.

[Mr. Heath]

The time has come for targeted badger control in infected areas—not across the whole country. I do not want to see a slaughter of badgers; they are an adornment and decoration to the countryside. I know that many people feel great affection for the species, but we have to deal with infected areas and individuals effectively. Given the prevalence of the species—certainly in Somerset, and, I suspect, the whole of the west country—I have no doubt that we will see recolonisation in a short time if such control is used, as there is only one natural predator of badgers: the motor car. The badger is an effective species, which clearly enjoys and proliferates in the ecology still available to it, so let us not be concerned about the future health of the population.

Pre and post-movement testing on mature cattle that are moved from farm to farm should be introduced as a matter of course, although we need to reach a satisfactory conclusion on who should pay for it. Putting more burdens on the agricultural community is probably unsustainable, but we need to put that testing regime in place. We need to maintain the research base for the reasons I gave: to discover the epidemiology and for vaccine effectiveness and production.

I do not know why there was such a small control experiment of post-mortem testing of road kill badgers, which was not done in some counties. Indeed, my county was excluded. That is a huge available resource. If there were post-mortem testing of road kills, we would have a much clearer idea of the extent of the spread of bovine TB in the badger population. That is an elementary step towards understanding the disease and its spread.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I would like to support the hon. Gentleman's comments about the routine examination of road kills. Fortunately, in Northamptonshire, there are very few cases of bovine TB. The Leicester animal health division of the state veterinary service reported only 39 bovine TB cases this year. There is no call locally for a targeted cull in Northamptonshire, but there would be popular support for the routine examination of badgers that fall victim to road kills.

Mr. Heath: That is interesting because that area is outside the main current focus, and I welcome what the hon. Gentleman said. It is not just badgers; we must be wary of widespread infection in other wildlife species. At least as a precautionary measure, we should be doing occasional post mortems of other road kill species—deer, in particular, in my area.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger rose—

Mr. Heath: Have I just said what the hon. Gentleman wished to say?

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: As a fellow Somerset MP, I am aware that there is a large red deer population on Exmoor. During the foot and mouth epidemic, to which I alluded earlier, there was no cattle movement. One of the issues that we explored, and I know that the hon. Gentleman supports it, was the wholesale checking of all deer that had been killed on Exmoor. Would he concur with that? I think that he probably would.

Mr. Heath: Given that that is what I just said, the hon. Gentleman can be confident that I will agree with him. There is a large deer population, not just on Exmoor and the Quantocks, but in my area—although not red deer, sadly. If they are potential vectors, we ought to know whether bovine tuberculosis has entered the herd.

The last point that I should like to make concerns compensation. We continue to be told that the Government intend to move from a system of 100 per cent. valuation to a tariff or tabular system. That has potential problems. I can see its attractions from the Treasury's point of view, but I fear for its consequences for some of our farmers. Can the Minister consider the difference in value between different breeds of cattle? I am thinking particularly about some of our rare breeds, which have huge potential value, although their market value is not always recognised in the same way. We must at least have variations within that tabular approach to allow for the difference between a pedigree herd and a superannuated milker—without being unkind to the black and whites in my constituency. There is a big difference in potential valuation.

I should also like to re-emphasise the urgency of the matter. When I asked a question on 20 October, the Secretary of State replied:

"Although I recognise that there are serious problems in areas such as the hon. Gentleman's constituency, he knows that that is not the case in other parts of the country."

Yes, I do, but it is my constituents that I am concerned about, because I am paid to represent them. She went on:

"We are anxious to tackle the problem in areas such as his, but we are just as anxious, if not more so, to keep clean areas clean."—[Official Report, 20 October 2005; Vol. 437, c. 979.]

I agree with that as well, but if that anxiety is expressed by the Secretary of State, it must now be translated into action by coming to a decision. Frankly, we have waited long enough for that decision. I hope that today is an opportunity for the Minister to stand up and tell us what he is going to do about bovine tuberculosis. If he does not, many people who are concerned about our agriculture industry, and the welfare of our wildlife, will want to know why he is continuing to dither.

Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): I apologise to you, Miss Widdecombe, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox) that I have to attend the Standards and Privileges Committee shortly. I shall make a short contribution because, like my hon. Friend who represents a neighbouring constituency, I have seen the situation in the west country aggravated by the spread of this disease in such a short space of time.

One of the reasons why the previous Conservative Government commissioned the Krebs report was that we realised that there had to be a fundamental change in policy if the geographic spread of this disease was to be curtailed. It was not only present in the south-west peninsular, but had gone round the corner from Bristol and was already into Gloucestershire and Herefordshire. We have now seen the further spread of the disease in such a short space of time.

When I was elected 14 years ago, my most northerly parish, Morebath, which borders Exmoor, had just had its first case of bovine tuberculosis. However, the disease is now well down the Exe valley. Indeed, I say to the Minister—he too is a neighbour of mine—that if he had farms in his constituency, I think that the disease would now be in his constituency too.

The aim of the Conservative Government in commissioning the Krebs report was to stop the geographic spread; we hoped that Krebs would come up with an alternative policy that could be implemented. I understand the difficulty that the Minister has; indeed I have spoken to him privately about that and about what I believe to be necessary, and I now do so publicly. The political will is needed to do something about this disease, which affects farmers to the extent so eloquently described by my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon—the impact on farmers and their families has to be seen to be believed. It is not just about the money, although that of course is important in any business, but about the sheer desperation that people suffer when they are restricted, when they can see their whole livelihood being taken away from them and feel totally impotent to do anything about it.

I have sat in the Minister's chair, and I know that when one is dealing with badgers, which are a protected species, one has to jump through lots of hoops. My hon. Friend mentioned the powers that the Minister has to take action. As a Minister, I issued licences for the killing of badgers but, in order to do so, I had to try to get the permission of all sorts of groups of people, such as badger groups and the official badger panel, that were set up when the species was first protected. I am sure that, at the time, their establishment was well intended. Those groups are there to introduce checks and balances on ministerial decision making but, in a case like this, they hamper the Minister in doing what is the right thing to do.

The Minister will know, because I know that he has seen the data, that there have been experiments and trials around the world, not least the one in the Republic of Ireland, which I have visited twice, once as a Minister and once since. We do not have to reinvent the wheel in the UK. We are part of the European Union, so surely we can respect the scientific analysis of a trial carried out in another EU country, without saying that we have now got to spend years trialling the same thing ourselves. There should be a much faster process by which we can say what works and what does not. I know that, in the absence of concrete scientific evidence, the situation is difficult, but it cannot be left as it is. The disease will soon become endemic in the UK.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) said that there are just a few cases in Northamptonshire. Give it five years, and he will not be standing up here and saying that there is no public feeling for action, because we have seen the same situation in Cornwall, Devon and Somerset. As the disease has spread, we could predict what would happen.

This debate, raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon, is timely because, after eight years, we are now waiting to see what the Government will do to make a difference to the farming community. I urge the Minister to act on this matter. If he does, he will have the support of many people in the House. I am sure that, with his persuasive powers, he can convince even the people who sit behind him in the Chamber that this is not just a slaughter policy; it is about the farming community and how it is suffering and the huge slaughter of farm animals. However, it is also about the welfare of the badger. It was once suggested to me that somehow tuberculosis does not affect badgers as it would any other species—human or animal. That is rubbish. They drag themselves around the countryside and become weak.

I love British culture, but I am worried by an aspect of it to do with animals—"The Wind in the Willows" approach to badgers. That must be changed. If people care about moles, rats and badgers, and other parts of our heritage, the well-being and health of badgers and wild creatures should matter. The Minister is best placed to make that case as the foundation for a change in policy. If that is to succeed, I am convinced that selective culling will be needed. When we commissioned the Krebs report, it was with the assumption that it would result in a need for culling to produce a cordon sanitaire around parts of the country to stop disease spreading down through the south-west peninsula, or further north.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): My hon. Friend has mentioned the Krebs report, and she was the Minister when it was implemented. The lack of a cordon sanitaire has led to exponential growth in the number of TB cases in the north-west, Staffordshire, Shropshire and Cheshire. Everything that my hon. Friends have said this morning applies to those counties as much as to the west-country.

Angela Browning: My hon. Friend is right. It was to try to prevent that spread that we asked Professor Krebs to examine existing policies.

I fully understand the difficulties that the Minister has. As a Minister I had to protect staff in what was then the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food from the criminal activity of activists and lobby groups who attacked their persons and their property.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): It is still happening.

Angela Browning: I know. I fully understand the sensitivities and difficulties that the Minister faces. However, the task requires political will and I hope that he will exercise that.

10.27 am

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox) on not only securing the debate but on the wealth of information that he has provided to hon. Members. Of course, we have been here before, and some of us who have attended such debates and been members of DEFRA Select Committees before which the Minister and others appeared, are experiencing a certain amount of déjà vu. A huge amount of concern has been generated over a long period.

The figures that the hon. Gentleman has brought before us, which have been available for some time and which show the rising tide of a terrible disease, cannot be disputed. As has been said, recent Government policy has been predicated on the Krebs trials. I had Krebs trials in my constituency: we have triplets in trials in South-East Cornwall. Everyone with any knowledge at all of the Krebs trials has no doubt of their proper intention. They were a real attempt to reach a scientific analysis. However, there are, and have been for some time, questions about the likely effectiveness of the outcome of the trials. If they are to be published, it will be interesting to see what, after such a period of time, they will definitely have established.

I was grateful to the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Angela Browning) who reminded us how long the process, which was set up in her time as a Minister, has been going on and what has been achieved. I am sure that she and her Devon colleagues know that the situation in Cornwall is just as dire. The so-called hot spots are becoming almost a rash, and we must consider where we are, rather than where we want to be or where we hoped or thought we would be.

The science is not exact, and it might not be for some time. The number of incidents has risen significantly, particularly in the south-west, at huge financial and personal cost—we must emphasise the personal costs to farmers and their families and those who work for them; they are under enormous stress—and no effective vaccine is in prospect. However, farmers have also to face other things that compound their problems, such as low market prices; the unprofitability of their enterprises; the introduction of the single farm payment, which will cause concern in the next year or two; and the increasing incidence of bovine TB outbreaks.

The situation is increasingly desperate. Liberal Democrats represent many rural areas, and it is sad to see a lot of empty seats opposite us. The Government have to recognise that, in rural areas, the cry for action is becoming louder. Given the fact that farmers have gone through BSE and foot and mouth and the desperate problems of low prices and outbreaks of TB, how many of them will decide that enough is enough and that they cannot continue? Despite all the social, financial and family implications that will inevitably follow, how many will give up?

In the past two months, I have received a huge number of letters and e-mails from constituents, and I know from colleagues in Cornwall and other parts of the south-west that the situation needs to be properly addressed. As my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said, the welfare of the badger has to be taken into account more often than it has been in the past; we are dealing with very sick animals. My party had supported the Government's intentions in the Krebs trials, and had been keen to ensure that animal welfare was at the heart of policy making. However, in view of the crisis, I asked my party to do something that took a lot of persuasion—to adopt a policy on selective culling. Such a move had been rejected a number of times because we had genuinely hoped that the Krebs trials would produce a scientific solution, that vaccine might be the way forward and that we would finally overcome the terrible disease. However, the situation had become so bad that if livestock farming were to survive in this country, even with long-term solutions in place, we had to get on top of it.

It is always said that bovine TB is a highly emotive issue, and that was true when my party discussed it. Some 10 weeks ago, we decided to adopt a new policy that had three elements: an immediate and focused programme of badger control in the hot spot areas to prevent or control cross-contamination between badgers and cattle; the introduction of pre and post-movement testing of cattle—that is not wholly supported by some of my constituents, which I can understand given the costs of testing, the impact on the value of animals and the effects on farming, but we felt that it was important if we were to support selective culling.

Mr. Heath: It is an important component. The hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) spoke about the situation in Cheshire. It is almost certain that that was caused by cattle-to-cattle transmission due to the movement of herds from the west country to Cheshire, rather than any spread through the badger population. We must be aware of that and be prepared to do something about it.

Mr. Breed: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention; I entirely agree with him.

The third element was that the Government have a further role to play in providing immediate and increased support for the development of a vaccine. There may be some elements of work on the BSG that could be useful. However, having spoken to a number of companies that are involved in vaccine development, it is clear that they will require significant Government support if they are to advance the programme. The likely profits that will be generated from a vaccine when it ultimately is obtained are not likely to encourage those companies to put an awful lot of their money into research and development.

It was with a heavy heart that my colleagues came to the conclusion that the situation was so desperate and had reached such a crisis, especially in the south-west, that culling was perhaps an inevitability. That was not because mass wholesale slaughter of badgers is a good thing; that would not take place. There would, however, be selective culling in known and persistent hot spots, especially in the south-west, to get on top of the situation while medium and long-term solutions are devised. As has been said by all hon. Members, we, the farming industry and many individual farmers are looking to the Minister and the Government to accept that the time has come for action, however unpalatable that may be, which it is for many. If the situation is not tackled now in a positive way, we will see a continuing spread of the disease, continuing misery in the farming industry, and perhaps we will be no further forward than we are now.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): It is a great pleasure, Miss Widdecombe, to serve under your chairmanship. I heartily congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox) not only on securing this debate, but on his splendid and robust speech. I should declare my interests as set out in the register, namely my agricultural rent. I should declare another interest: I am probably the only MP who has had one pet badger, and I can guarantee that I am the only MP who has had two pet badgers.

I entirely endorse the comments of the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), and of my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Angela Browning). There are real concerns on animal welfare, especially as regards badgers, and it grieves me to think that the descendants of my badgers could be suffering a hideous death due to Government neglect on TB.

There has been a developing hot spot around Market Drayton in my constituency. I spoke to Heulwen Charles of the National Farmers Union yesterday, who estimates that 25 per cent. of the dairy farms around Drayton have been affected by TB. Since I became a shadow Minister, I have made it my business to go around the country. I have been to the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon, I have seen Mr Yewdall, and I have asked more than 600 parliamentary questions on this matter. I would like to thank the Minister and the civil servants for the manner in which they have answered my questions because we have flushed out a huge amount of information, some of which I shall touch on.

Conservative Members wish to see a healthy prosperous cattle industry alongside a sustainable, managed and healthy wildlife population. At the moment, we have neither. DEFRA's consultation document of last year stated that we will spend £2 billion of taxpayers' money over the next 10 years not curing TB. In the Minister's own words, in a parliamentary reply:

"The Government recognise that eradication of bovine TB is unlikely to be achieved in the next 10 years using current control methods."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 31 January 2004; Vol. 418, c. 1465W.]

The numbers are staggering. Another parliamentary reply states that, in 1997, we slaughtered 3,760 cattle. The latest figures up to the end of October show that, this year, we have already killed 25,757 cattle. By the end of the year, that figure will represent a 700 per cent. increase on 1997.

The phenomenon occurs because we will not bear down on disease in both sectors. There is disease in both cattle and wildlife. Transmission may be cattle to cattle, cattle to wildlife, wildlife to wildlife or wildlife to cattle. The phenomenon that demonstrates that is closed farms. A Mr. Evans from Yockleton near Shrewsbury sent me an e-mail last week. They have had a breakdown, with serious badger activity on the farm, and that farm has closed after operating for more than 100 years.

I went to St. Mawes after the Royal Cornwall show. The Miles from St. Mawes have had a farm since 1966. On two sides is the sea, on one side is a village and on another side is a clean farm. They have bought in only three bulls since 1966, yet two years ago they found sick badgers on the farm—four were dead—and they recently lost half their herd. In a letter to the Minister, Mrs. Miles said:

"We are now in an impossible position. We have a business in crisis without the legal means to eradicate the likely cause of our problems."

As Mrs. Charles told me only yesterday in an e-mail:

"it seems totally unacceptable to be forced into slaughtering farm livestock that have Bovine TB and yet as an animal loving country we allow badgers who we know to be suffering from the disease to live. This not only allows them to spread the disease but die a most inhumane death."

The Minister told me in a written reply of the extraordinarily high level of infectivity of badger urine when badgers have renal TB. He stated:

"Bacterial loads of up to 300,000"

colony forming units

"per millilitre of urine have been measured. This suggests that inhalation of as little as 0.03 ml of the urine could result in infection."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 29 January 2004; Vol. 417, c. 485W.]

Again, the Minister told us on 29 January 2004 at column 483W that TB will survive in manure for two years and on pasture for five to 11 months. He also acknowledges the cruelty to badgers. In another reply, referring to an animal that may have had late-stage TB, he states that "there would undoubtedly be an effect on the quality of life of such an animal."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 10 December 2003; Vol. 415, c. 523W.]

We so nearly got rid of the problem. In the 1930s, 40 per cent. of dairy cows were considered tuberculous. By using the tuberculin test and slaughter, before we had a wildlife reservoir, we got the figure down to 0.01 per cent. of animals tested in 1972. In 1971, a badger with tuberculosis was found in Gloucestershire next to a farm where two heifers had gone down with TB.

We have seen what happens where we do bear down on disease in wildlife. In another written reply, the Minister said:

"Four large-scale badger clearances have been carried out, at Thornbury in Avon ... Steeple Leaze in Dorset ... Hartland in North Devon ... and in an area of East Offaly in the Irish Republic ... All four clearances were followed by a reduction in the incidence of TB in cattle."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 22 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 1365W.]

Again, in the Minister's words,

"No confirmed cases of tuberculosis in cattle in the area of the Thornbury operation were disclosed by the tuberculin test in the 10-year period following the cessation of gassing."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 28 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 385W.]

Again, in the Minister's words:

"The fundamental difference between the Thornbury area and other areas in south west England, where bovine tuberculosis was a problem, was the systematic removal of badgers from the Thornbury area. No other species was similarly removed. No other contemporaneous change was identified that could have accounted for the reduction in TB incidence within the area."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 24 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 826W.]

For two years, we were told to wait for the four-counties trial in Ireland. We now have the results. Removal of the badger population led to a reduction in breakdowns of 57 per cent. in Monaghan, 74 per cent. in Kilkenny, 75 per cent. in Cork and 96 per cent. in Donegal. That was confirmed by a number of vets.

[Mr. Owen Paterson]

John Gallagher, who has huge experience in TB as a former adviser on TB to DEFRA and as the retired senior vet for Devon and Cornwall, wrote a letter to the Secretary of State in February. There are now 420 vets behind the letter. They have 150 years of experience—frankly, more experience than all the Government's scientific advisers put together—and they are disgusted that badgers are "condemned to a worsening eternity of tuberculosis disease".

Pictures were revealed by Dr. Gallagher in an article in the Veterinary Times showing the hideous deaths that tuberculous badgers suffer. Those vets were clear. They said that the Krebs trial, which has been referred to, is now "hopelessly compromised" and that it is "a hugely expensive exercise which is most unlikely to yield any valid results. It is thus unacceptable to continue using this trial as an excuse for inaction . . . tuberculous badgers suffer a prolonged and wretched death and . . . a quarter of over 5000 badgers tested by MAFF during 1996 to 1998 were infected".

Again, vets who are very knowledgeable on this disease are emphatic that TB leads badgers to die cruel deaths. They have said:

"Just killing more and more cattle was the approach we used forty years ago before we knew the badger was a maintenance host . . . Then it was understandable, now it is incomprehensible . . . We feel this charade should cease immediately allowing effective control to be started forthwith."

Those vets cannot be blamed for thinking that the Krebs trials are discredited.

In another reply, the Minister said:

"Evidence from post cull surveys suggests that trapping efficiency can vary between 30 per cent. and 80 per cent."—[Official Report, 29 April 2004; Vol. 420, c. 1189W.]

It is not surprising that there is perturbation if 70 per cent. of badgers were so scared out of their wits that they scattered around the country spreading disease. The Minister has also told me that 57 per cent. of the traps were interfered with and 12 per cent. of them were stolen.

It is clear at the highest levels of veterinary knowledge in this country what should be done. The president of the British Veterinary Association, Dr. Bob McCracken, said:

"The infected badger must be controlled and removed—we are no longer debating if the infected badger should be removed; what we are debating is how to do so in an effective manner".

Yet, as recently as two weeks ago, the Minister seemed to be in denial. In a written answer, he claimed:

"Eighty per cent. of TB cases are spread from cattle to cattle"—[Official Report, 17 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 1089W.]

That is in total contradiction to the views of his own scientists. The central science laboratory said that the figure could be as low as 15 to 74 per cent. The Minister's claim has already been refuted in studies by Professor Wilesmith, a world-renowned expert who is convinced that there is badger transmission.

I repeat that transmission can be from cattle to cattle, cattle to badger, badger to cattle or badger to badger. We have to bear down on both sources of disease, but the Minister is absolutely determined not to do so. In a reply to me, he actually said:

"It is current policy not to issue any licences under sub-section 10(2)(a)"— of the Protection of Badgers Act 1992—

"to prevent the spread of bovine tuberculosis."—[Official Report, 18 March 2004; Vol. 419, c. 433W.]

He has made up his mind. He has not told Parliament why he has, in effect, repealed a section of British law.

I have tried to help the Minister. I have met scientists at Warwick university, who are convinced that they can get round one of his biggest problems—his fear of unnecessarily culling healthy badgers. Those scientists are convinced that polymerase chain reaction technology—PCR—could identify setts where diseased badgers live, because badgers live in social groups and use latrines. In his reply to me, however, the Minister was looking for an excuse not to accept advances in technology.

I went to Michigan to see how the Americans have handled TB, and they dismissed the Minister's reply as quibbling. They are convinced that there is real use to be made from identifying TB around badger setts, which could help us to take out the diseased badgers and leave healthy ones. We all agree that we want to leave the healthy ones, partly because they are a barrier to the spread of disease by diseased badgers.

There are real lessons to be learned in Michigan. I was astonished by the severity with which the federal and state authorities treated the disease. The lessons are simple: bear down on disease in cattle using fast, accurate and modern means of diagnosis. In Michigan, the authorities gave cattle a skin test and used gamma interferon and PCR. They have rigidly enforced, but workable pre-movement testing and movement restrictions. I went there thinking that pre-movement control was probably a political gesture on the part of the farming community to get action from the Government on wildlife, but it is more than that—it is an integral part of the community success in getting rid of disease in cattle. The farming community recently went for two years without a single herd going down.

However, the authorities also took vigorous, if unpopular, action to bear down on disease in wildlife. The white-tailed deer is iconic, but the culling of deer by means of hunting exceeds the culling of cattle. There is a huge public education programme, and the white-tailed deer population has been reduced by half. People were astonished by the grotesque level of disease in this country.

To take the necessary measures, the Government must keep the confidence of the farming community. It is vital that they do not chisel on compensation, as has perhaps been proposed with the tabular valuation. That runs directly counter to the experience in America, where farmers really co-operated. Reducing the disease is simple, and that will reduce the cost, which will help the Treasury.

It is not only the cattle industry, the beef industry and the dairy industry that are at risk. As the US chief vet in charge of TB said, bovine tuberculosis is a serious zoonosis, which is dangerous to humans. It has already been transmitted to dogs and cats, and some humans have picked it up from cattle.

We were promised a statement on TB this autumn, but I do not count 6 December as autumn. The Government's attitude is incomprehensible. Whatever the reason for it, Government inaction is a scandalous dereliction of their duty to protect the people, cattle and wildlife of this country from an age-old preventable disease.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): May I, like other hon. Members, congratulate the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Cox) on securing this debate and on his excellent speech, with its Shakespearean flourishes? I do not think that anyone has ever compared me to Nero, but there is always a first time. I am also grateful to him for mentioning the constructive meeting that we held with a delegation of farmers from his constituency. As a fellow Member representing the west country, I am well aware of the level of concern in his constituency, and much of our region, about bovine TB.

I want to correct some of the figures that the hon. Gentleman gave, which I do not think that he would want to remain on the record. I understand that he was not comparing like with like, but was comparing new herd incidence with confirmed incidence. The actual figures are that there were 396 confirmed new incidents last year and 350 confirmed new incidents between January and October this year. I think that the figure that he gave of 600-and-something was not confirmed. However, there is no doubt that there has been a significant increase, as he said. The current trend nationally is about 18 per cent. a year.

This is the most challenging animal health problem that we face. Successive Governments have grappled with it since incidence began to increase in the mid-1980s. As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, the disease is complex, and some of the key related scientific issues still are not fully understood. However, he was also gracious enough to acknowledge that the Government have not been idle—I think that those are the words he used. I shall come to the wildlife controls shortly, as that is the issue about which hon. Members have been most concerned this morning.

As the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) has just acknowledged, international experience shows that good cattle controls are also absolutely essential in the fight against bovine TB. Those controls have been improved in the past year. We have taken a number of measures: we have calculated the routine testing intervals; applied movement restrictions immediately TB tests are overdue; developed a more rigorous and systematic approach to identifying and dealing with potential new TB hot spots; and introduced rigorous testing schedules for new and reformed herds.

It is now widely acknowledged on both sides of the House that the pre-movement testing of cattle is vital to prevent the spread of TB to the majority of areas in the country that are relatively clear of the disease. Scotland has already introduced it, and the rest of Britain cannot delay any longer.

Towards the end of last year we convened a stakeholder group—chaired by a farmer—to recommend an effective and practical mechanism of pre-movement testing. Details of how that will be applied will form part of our forthcoming announcement, which is also likely to contain details of changes to the way in which compensation will be paid, an expansion of the use of the gamma interferon test as a supplement to the skin test and an update on research, including that into vaccines.

Several hon. Members stressed the importance of developing a vaccine, which is, of course, our ultimate goal, but, as they accepted, that is some way off. Vaccine trials in the field have recently been approved, including one on badgers and a new study into potential cattle vaccines.

As hon. Members on both sides of the House acknowledge, just as bovine TB cannot be successfully tackled without strong measures to prevent the spread of the disease between cattle, international experience suggests that it cannot be contained or eradicated if its presence in wildlife is not addressed. That brings me to the thorny issue of badgers.

It has long been accepted that, in this country, badgers are the main wildlife hosts for bovine TB. The problem for the Government, in formulating policy, was that no proper scientific work had been done to study the role that badgers play in spreading the disease to cattle, or what wildlife controls might help to reduce the level of the disease in cattle. That is why they set up the Krebs trials, which started in 1998 and are almost complete. The final season's culling has finished and data will continue to be collected, but because of the urgency of the situation, I asked the Independent Scientific Group, which runs the trials, to provide us with its interim findings as soon as possible, which it has agreed to do. Those findings are currently being peer reviewed. They will help to inform the nature of the announcement that we intend to make soon. We have also carefully studied the experience in the Republic of Ireland, which has carried out its own badger culling trials.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon for accepting—at least in his terms, if not those of his hon. Friends—that December still constitutes the autumn. It was always our intention to make an announcement before the recess, and we intend to stick to that. It is going to be made slightly later than we had originally proposed because of the interim findings from the ISG and the need for them to have a rapid peer review. However, that will be completed on time. A number of hon. Members have tried to tempt me to make an announcement here today, but I beg their patience for a few more days. They will understand, when they see the interim results from the trials, the reason for us wanting to wait for them before making an announcement.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: Will the announcement be made before the recess?

Mr. Bradshaw: That is our current plan, yes.

Mr. Cox: Will the announcement address the question of the use of culling policy as a tool?

Mr. Bradshaw: It certainly will. As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged himself, there is still quite a lot of uncertainty about the science. He used the phrase that he hoped that policy would be based on the best available science, and I can certainly reassure him that that is the case. However, that leads me on to some of the simplistic solutions that are sometimes volunteered, including, I am afraid to say, by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who gave the impression that targeted culling of infected badgers is a solution. I do not want to have to wait to make a policy announcement on badger culling until the PCR tests, for which the hon. Member for North Shropshire called, are available. That would mean that we would have to wait too long. Given that, any badger culling policy will not be restricted to badgers that are infected. I do not have a problem with that, but there must be honesty in the debate that that is what would happen.

The other thing that Liberal Democrat Members need to be aware of is that, although the science is uncertain, the overall burden of scientific evidence seems strongly to suggest that for a badger culling policy to be effective, it must be intensive and widespread, and that localised, targeted culling—whatever one wants to call it—at best, probably does not help. Most of the evidence so far seems to indicate that the sort of limited culling that is advocated by the Liberal Democrats would make things much worse.

Mr. Breed: Just to clarify that, we are not talking about individual farms, or even a cluster of farms, but about fairly significant areas within the south-west, which, as a part of the whole country, are a localised situation.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am grateful for that clarification, and I am sure that when the announcement is made in the next couple of weeks, we shall have a discussion on the sort of details to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

I think that I am right in saying that, in his previous life, the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon was a lawyer.

Mr. Cox: Yes.

Mr. Bradshaw: Indeed. In that case, I have even more reason to feel grateful for his free legal advice about the pros and cons of badger culling policy. Let me assure him that, in my brief experience as a Minister, I always listen carefully to the advice that our lawyers give me, but then I make a decision based on what I think is the right policy. As he pointed out, it is possible to get legal advice that would militate in favour, as well as legal advice that would militate against, a badger culling policy, for different reasons. What is important is that Ministers make the decision based on what they believe the right policy is.

We have had a constructive debate, although I am sorry not to be able to liberate hon. Members who have attended it from their impatience. I share that impatience, but this is a serious animal disease that causes a great deal of grief and distress, not just to farmers, but in rural communities. I know the constituency of the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon reasonably well. As we have repeatedly said, if the evidence suggests that badger culling would be a successful, cost-effective and sustainable tool in our battle against the terrible disease, the Government will not shy away from recommending it.

New Electronic Media

12.30 pm

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): I am delighted to have secured this debate. Most discussions so far about broadband Britain have focused on technical infrastructure, and more attention must now be paid to the content that will fill the new high-capacity pipes.

First, it is important to set the scene. We can be proud that broadband is available to 99.6 per cent. of the population of the United Kingdom—the highest coverage in any G7 country. However, that does not mean that the task of constructing the infrastructure is complete. Most broadband users can access speeds of only 512 kilobits per second. That is not true broadband, but it is a darn sight faster and broader—10 times faster, in fact—than dial-up. True broadband should have the ability to stream moving images, and that requires a stable data transfer rate of at least 2 megabits, perhaps 4 megabits, per second. The challenge that faces the Government and the telecoms companies already involved in development is to make such feeds widely available.

The ability to access still and moving images is one of the key advantages of true high-speed broadband, and I want to focus on the audiovisual content. Hollywood movies, soap operas and high-level sport will continue to play a large role, but the potential of broadband networks will not be fully realised if they are used simply as an additional platform for the distribution of traditional television channels, or as an alternative to the video rental shop.

By a happy coincidence, at the same time as broadband is cutting audiovisual distribution costs, the costs of professional-quality AV production are also falling. Some of the digital video cameras on sale in the high street are equivalent to the BBC's most sophisticated colour equipment of only a few years ago. Furthermore, the podcasting phenomenon has already demonstrated that there is a large public appetite for do-it-yourself content, produced by individuals outside the mainstream media. There is, therefore, good reason to expect the audiovisual markets of the future to be very different from those with which we are familiar. It is feasible to anticipate the development of a rich ecosystem of niche content providers serving local communities and minority interests, rather than the mass national audiences that we have today—and even those have shrunk, thanks to the diversity of TV channels now available.

That development represents a particular opportunity for the UK economy. We already have a strong creative sector that accounts for more than 8 per cent. of gross domestic product. In addition to the economic benefits, it has huge potential to enrich individuals' quality of life. However, the European Commission plans to regulate all audiovisual services, and that is a matter for concern. Specifically, it will shortly present proposals for the revision of the so-called television without frontiers directive. The legislation will establish an effective single market for traditional TV services by forbidding any member state to block the reception or retransmission of broadcasts made in conformity with the law of all the other member states. So far, so good. However, in pursuit of that objective, the Commission will lay down minimum standards for national legislation in a number of areas, the three most significant of which are advertising, protection of minors and European content quotas.

The Commissioner responsible for the rules, Mrs. Viviane Reding, has announced her intention to amend their scope so that they apply to all services that involve the delivery of moving images to the general public across electronic networks. As we move to a world in which every citizen is a potential content provider, the plan presents huge scope for unnecessary constraints and unintended consequences. That is inevitable, as the regulation is happening to an industry that—for all practical purposes—does not yet exist. Nobody knows what successful business models will look like in that fast-moving sector. The Commission is nevertheless suggesting a leap in the dark.

Such a leap is, in fact, completely unnecessary. None of the justifications that Mrs. Reding has advanced for additional EU regulation stand up to scrutiny. Let me take three points. First, there is no need for EU action to ensure that there is a level playing field between traditional broadcasters and providers of new on-demand services. All European countries agree on the need to prevent children from having access to unsuitable material, and to avoid exposing consumers to untruthful advertising. In other words, they will try to ensure that new on-demand services respect the same public policy objectives as traditional services, whether or not they are forced to do so by European Union legislation.

In most EU member states, on-demand services are already subject to some form of control. In the UK, for example, a successful self-regulatory regime—the Association for Television on Demand—has already been established by the industry in question, and the internet is not excluded from the jurisdiction of the Advertising Standards Authority. If any gaps are revealed as the sector develops, they can easily be filled by national legislation, which is better able to accept rapidly evolving circumstances than inflexible EU regulation. I think that that is what is called subsidiarity.

Secondly, although underlying public policy objectives need to be the same in both areas, the principle of technological neutrality demands that traditional broadcasters and providers of on-demand services are not regulated in the same way. By definition, the latter offer greater opportunities for user choice and parental control. Password controls can be used to ensure that children are protected. Such protections are unavailable on traditional TV. The 9 o'clock watershed is almost irrelevant as younger children stay up later. And what protection is that? Has anyone here seen the latest episode of "Rome"? Consequently, it is far from self-evident that on-demand services should be subjected to requirements designed for a world where user choice was limited to a small number of licensed broadcasters, where the broadcasters rather than the viewers decided what their audience would watch, and where a large part of the population watched the same thing at the same time.

Thirdly, there is the freedom to provide services across borders, which should be the Commission's central concern. That freedom is already guaranteed for on-demand services by another piece of EU legislation, the so-called e-commerce directive. Mrs. Reding argues that that guarantee is not firm enough; member states may still block foreign services in certain circumstances. However, no amount of Brussels harmonisation will remove the need for service providers to continue to tailor audiovisual services to national languages and cultural preferences. The guarantees provided by the e-commerce directive are therefore proportionate to the foreseeable scope for cross-border trade in services.

In fact, the only argument in favour of the Commission's proposals appears to be bureaucratic neatness; it looks untidy if EU rules apply to one type of audiovisual content but another escapes. Although that argument may appeal to some of the more Cartesian controlling minds in Brussels, I should like to enter a plea for good old Anglo-Saxon pragmatism: "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." That viewpoint is shared by practically all the UK organisations that would be affected by an extension in the scope of EU legislation—and many of their European counterparts. In the UK the broadband stakeholders' group, the ICT trade association Intellect, the Internet Service Providers Association and ATVOD, the self-regulatory body that I mentioned earlier, are united in their opposition to such a move. In the EU, the European Telecommunications Network Operators Association and the European Competitive Telecommunications Association also oppose it.

It has therefore been gratifying to note the Government's response to the final round of consultations conducted by the European Commission prior to the adoption of its proposal. In short, the Government appear to concur that Mrs. Reding's plans are completely superfluous. Does the Minister agree with that summary? Does he further agree that those plans stand in direct contradiction to President Barroso's better regulation agenda, which requires new EU legislation to respond to a clearly defined need, to be proportionate and to be accompanied by a reliable impact assessment? Will he provide an assurance than the UK will maintain robust opposition to the extended scope of EU legislation when the proposals are discussed at the Council of Ministers, which he will attend?

Sometimes we can see bad legislation only with the benefit of hindsight, but in this instance we can it coming like an express train. I hope that the Minister can reassure me, the telecoms industry and future users of this new medium that he will stop this bad legislation in its tracks.

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) for the way in which he introduced this interesting debate on a challenging policy issue. I am particularly pleased that he acknowledged at the start the enormous success that we have had in recent years in moving from the rear of the pack in the broadband race to pole position. Broadband is now available to 99.6 per cent. of the UK population—the highest level of any G7 country. We can both celebrate that development.

The hon. Gentleman said much that was positive and much with which I can agree. He also said a great deal about ambition, which fits with the work being led by my colleagues at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and with the ambitions of the Government's digital strategy, on which I am the lead Minister. For those reasons, I shall focus on the way in which we need to revise European legislation on this issue, and I hope that my comments will command the hon. Gentleman's support.

Essentially, we need converged light-touch regulation fit for a converged world, but I suspect that we are unlikely to reach that stage in one leap. Indeed, when the pace of change is so fast, it might turn out to be a leap in the dark. Let me explain. Since it was last revised in 1997, the television without frontiers directive has delivered significant economic and cultural benefits to consumers and producers. Europe has benefited from a single market in TV services—however imperfect—and that has also enabled the industry to prosper. Consumers have benefited from an increased range and variety of programming and from the various protections under the directive.

However, times have changed. Over the lifetime of the directive, we have seen massive technological advances and the convergence of different media and technologies. In the light of that, and of the fact that parts of the directive are getting on for 20 years old, the European legislative framework for broadcasting needs to change. We would have had to reassess it anyway to see how well it was standing up against the requirements of the television industry and consumers. However, because of the acceleration of technological change and the major challenge of convergence, it is not enough to ask whether the directive is achieving its goals of promoting trans-frontier broadcasting in tandem with cultural diversity and the development of the European programme industry. We have to go much further—a point on which the hon. Gentleman and I also clearly agree. We have to look 10 years ahead and persuade politicians across Europe, and—this is sometimes an even bigger challenge—administrations across Europe, to understand and anticipate a world that they can hardly imagine in their wildest dreams, and to ensure that our European legislation will be fit for purpose then, not just in the present era.

We therefore welcome the re-examination of the directive. We want a flexible and proportionate directive that adheres to the better regulation principles being propounded by President Barroso, as the hon. Gentleman said. That will allow e-industry to grow and ensure that the regulations are future-proofed as far as possible. That task is not easy, and it is made risky by the enormous pace of change in the technological base of the industry.

The preamble to the 1997 revision of the television without frontiers directive actually mentions

"the opportunities for growth" in the audiovisual sector

"opened up by new technologies".

But the difference between 1997 and 2005 is that we were then predicting convergence in a general sort of way, whereas today we are in the middle of the reality of convergence and, as both the hon. Gentleman and I have said, we can see that pace increasing rather than decreasing. In today's world, television and on-demand services can be delivered down telephone lines, and viewers can have access to TV over the internet. The development of both fixed and mobile telephony is accelerating those changes. We can therefore be clear about one thing: convergence and the blurring of boundaries between previously separate media will continue and will produce new challenges—almost daily, probably.

Those challenges go to the core of the way in which broadcasting is regulated. What do we mean when we talk about broadcasting? What distinguishes broadcasting from other forms of communication? In the UK, we have tried to cope with that by having a technology-neutral definition of what a television service is, and have tried to make it future-proof by providing flexibility in the Communications Act 2003 to amend the definition should technological change require it.

Defining the scope of future regulation is at the heart of this issue. The Commission proposes that a revised directive should be underpinned by the new concept of "audiovisual content services", with different regulation for what are termed linear and non-linear services. Linear services are conventional TV-like services, whereas non-linear services are those pulled down by viewers, such as video on demand.

I see the key objectives of television without frontiers as to secure a genuine single market, to drive enterprise and to protect consumers and cultural diversity. In order to design changes that will work, we have to ask ourselves certain questions. I hope that many of the hon. Gentleman's concerns will be answered by the reassurance that we are asking the right questions, as that is the only way to get the right answers.

We should be asking the following questions. Can the distinction between linear and non-linear be made, or has it already been overtaken by technological change and new business models? Can we bridge the clear differences of view between traditional broadcasters and the providers of new services? There are some opportunities here. The hon. Gentleman mentioned Commissioner Viviane Reding; she and I co-hosted an event in July for the chief executives of a variety of organisations across Europe, at which there was an exciting debate in which it became clear that leading figures in the industry not only see the impact of convergence, but are starting to engage with issues of content. That goes across the scope of television, mobile telephony and the internet. The question that I posed—can we bridge the clear differences of view between traditional broadcasters and the providers of new services?—remains a challenging one for them as well as for us.

My third question is: should we—indeed, can we—level regulation down rather than up? We are keen on the model of light regulation and proportionate regulation, but it takes a good deal of effort at the design stage. I might return to this issue if provoked.

My fourth question is: can we design a system of co-regulation and self-regulation that achieves virtue with the minimum of red tape for the good guys while coming down heavily on the small minority of bad guys? In other words, can we create a system with the light-touch effectiveness of the antisocial behaviour order instead of the pedantic and expensive bureaucracy of the traditional court system? I dare say that I might get into trouble with the lawyers by making that point, but that is the way in which we should proceed. My fifth question is: can co-regulation and self-regulation bridge the divide between traditional broadcasters and the providers of new services?

Finally, given that the ultimate in self-regulation is the use of the off switch, we must consider how far we should regulate for protection and how far we should provide audiences with the tools to control what they want to watch, what they do not want to watch, and what they do not want their children to watch. I am sure from the hon. Gentleman's introductory remarks that he will agree that that question must be part of our approach.

In considering those questions, part of my answer is to point to examples of success. One of the best examples is what we have done in the UK to prevent access to child abuse and child pornography. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that, and said that it was an issue on which we could all agree. It is, but agreeing that one wishes to eradicate something is not the same as doing so. In this area, the strength of legislation often flies in the face of Edward Gibbon's advice that legislation often fails to prevent what it forbids.

This is not a case of the industry saying, "It can't be done," although one would have to go back only a short time to find the industry and those who had a particular interest in the internet saying that it could not and should not be done. We do not want the Government to produce heavy legislation under pressure from child protection non-governmental organisations and Members of Parliament, who are frequently swift to call for light regulation or no regulation until it comes to something they do not like, in which case they demand immediate legislation

Instead, the industry, the NGOs and the Government have worked with the police to produce a light-touch example of effective co-operative action that has achieved more in a year without legislation then we could have achieved in five years with it. I can confirm that that is the approach that we will be arguing for in the Council of Ministers. Clearly, it has limitations, but it has much to commend it. In a market that is moving very rapidly that approach has even more to commend it, because the time that it takes to produce national legislation—never mind European legislation—means that the industry and the technology is likely to have moved on a considerable distance by the time of implementation.

It is not for me to say much about the potential challenges for advertiser-funded broadcasting. The potential impact of personal video recorders has led to a great amount of debate among providers of free-to-air broadcasting. On one hand, there is the question of whether some of the rather detailed quantitative rules in the directive might be relaxed; on the other hand, there are divided views on the acceptability of new product placement techniques. I am sure that the latter issue should be thoroughly considered as part of the process.

[Alun Michael]

One strength of the current directive is the clear and distinct difference between programming and commercial promotions, so that audiences know when they are being sold something, and when they are receiving an independent communication. That separation maintains the confidence of consumers in the editorial integrity of programmes. One major challenge is to maintain that distinction in any new arrangements, given the range of questions and complications that we have already spelt out in the course of this short debate.

We must also examine costs and benefits. As the hon. Gentleman said earlier, with any new regulatory instrument it is important to weigh up the benefits against the costs and burdens, so we will have to scrutinize carefully the Commission's promised full regulatory impact assessment of its forthcoming proposal. Just as we apply that sort of impact assessment to our legislation in an increasingly stringent and professional way, we wish to see that become ever more effective with European legislation.

New legislation must be effective and enforceable. However, if we are to deliver the Lisbon agenda, it must also be flexible to encourage the growth of European businesses and markets. I have frequently made the point that the growth of our GDP across Europe has been some 40 per cent. dependent on information and communication technologies in recent years. However, the level in the United States is some 80 per cent. I suspect that if we could find a UK figure—these are figures from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development—we would come somewhere between the two. That shows the benefits of our more open market and greater competitiveness, although that is still not at the level seen in the United States and some of our competitor countries in the far east and elsewhere. There is a big challenge to ensure an effective focus on the Lisbon agenda—which was, incidentally, the focus of debate in the European Telecommunications Council that I chaired last week.

If we fail to ensure that regulation has a light touch where possible, is fit for purpose and addresses the realities of technology and industry, we will fail Europe, and Europe will live in the past instead of competing dynamically with economies such as the USA, never mind China, India, Korea and Japan. There is still some way to go in resolving the detail of the directive, but when the Commission has published the draft we shall be in a better position to consult stakeholders, respond properly to the proposals and debate the issue properly, thoroughly and in detail with parliamentarians.

In areas such as i2010, the policy that we agreed last week, and which Viviane Reding, the Commissioner, has actively promoted during the UK presidency, I found her to be extremely forward-looking, and to have real vision about being ambitious for Europe. I am sure that we will be able to persuade her that the process of revising the television without frontiers directive must be dynamic, forward-looking and imaginative, and must find new and non-bureaucratic ways of achieving appropriate regulation and avoiding inappropriate regulation and bureaucracy. That can be achieved if we use our strengths and talents to the full across the different sectors.

In the short period since I took on this brief, I have been impressed by the amount and quality of the engagement between officials in the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport with industry leaders in this important and challenging area of policy. I share some of the hon. Gentleman's concerns, but I am optimistic that we will be able to deliver the type of legislation that he seeks, and I look forward to debating the issues with him over the months to come.

Community Courts

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): While health, education, the police and local councils now all work closely together in partnership to tackle our social problems locally, one institution stands aloof, not pulling its weight—the legal system. It often uses judicial independence and impartiality as an excuse to avoid the social responsibility that we must all share. That is an attitude as damaging and corrupting of social justice as was the canteen culture of the police—which, to their credit, they are changing. The legal system, too, must change.

That is felt at its keenest in constituencies such as mine and the Minister's, where despite the personal commitment and professional dedication of local professionals and practitioners, the culture of the legal system stands in the way of the comprehensive, multi-agency approach that we are all trying to build. Things need not be like that, and the Lord Chancellor needs to reposition the Department for Constitutional Affairs as a public service—customer-driven not producer-driven, freeing our talented local professionals to engage with our communities, not staff a system that looks down on them. That needs vision at ministerial and departmental level, and there are several strategies for achieving it. I want to talk about one of those strategies today.

Several weeks ago I had the opportunity to visit Red Hook in Brooklyn. Having had the usual problems of overburdened magistrates, ineffective results and high recidivism rates, the deprived neighbourhood of Red Hook established the Red Hook community court in 2000. The court emphasises rehabilitation, prevention and community involvement rather than punishment alone. Defendants were brought in one after the other before Judge Calabrese, and they had a personal and direct relationship with him. What I saw illustrated the emphasis on mediation and the strong commitment to helping with the lives of those, often young, people rather than simply locking them up to reoffend later.

Community courts are about taking proactive steps to prevent antisocial behaviour and criminality. Community justice involves identifying, acknowledging and addressing the range of problems that contribute to entanglement in the criminal justice system, rather than simply focusing on the crime itself. A single judge hears multi-jurisdictional cases in one court and becomes an integral element of the community. He can hand down sentences of up to one year. He goes to community meetings; indeed, he initiates them—an experience that has not ended civilisation as the judiciary knows it, or called his integrity or impartiality into question. A judge whose tiny staff take polaroids of damp and squalid housing conditions in the community and bring the municipal landlord to court is seen to be delivering justice impartially in the community. In some people's eyes, that is the first time that that has ever happened.

The results are as follows. Some 75 per cent. of defendants complied with sanctions in Red Hook, compared with 50 per cent. at the traditional court in downtown Brooklyn, the re-arrest rate among drug offenders who had completed a community court-monitored treatment plan was 29 per cent. lower over three years, and the annual arrest rate of defendants who had completed at least 90 days of court-mandated drug treatment fell over three years from 2.3 annual arrests before the intervention to 0.9 annual arrests.

Justice is seen to have a real impact on the community. The average arrest-to-arraignment time was 18.9 hours, compared with 29.2 hours at the downtown Manhattan court. The arrangements deliver justice swiftly. With results such as those, the community court movement began to expand, and the empirical research on those jurisdictions reinforces the successful data coming out of Red Hook.

The Department for Constitutional Affairs conducted a study of the US community courts and released the results in May 2005. It found that the community courts had less backlog, the community was more satisfied and defendants were more compliant with sentences.

The movement to create community courts in the UK is building. Lord Falconer, the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, observed:

"Involving the community in deciding the priorities of the centre will mean that local people will see their main concerns being tackled with real and visible payback for the crimes that affect their way of life in their neighbourhood."

I agree wholeheartedly.

That ties in perfectly with neighbourhood policing and all our other local initiatives to put a human face on public services. The public respond whenever we do that, especially in the criminal justice system. In Nottingham tenants, residents, beat officers, neighbourhood wardens, probation officers, the Crown Prosecution Service and many others to whom I have spoken welcome the idea of a community court.

The very nature of community courts encourages an atmosphere in which a greater number of parties become involved in the process, and leads to wider justice for all. If a youth breaks someone's window, justice might involve getting the perpetrator to apologise to the owner and to work in community service projects to fix what they have broken. Rebuilding respect for the criminal justice system so that it is seen to deliver for people in local communities is radically different from the alienated process to which we have become accustomed in magistrates courts and other courts.

In community courts, those who violate the law see how their actions adversely affect other members of society. In addition, members of the community are more confident about giving evidence and helping to prevent problems from recurring. I am sure that witness intimidation is as big a problem in the constituencies of other hon. Members here as it is in mine, and it has to be tackled at the local level. Once we can administer justice at that level, community confidence will begin to be rebuilt. In community courts, those who are wronged also get a greater sense of justice because they are involved with the system, and feel better compensated by the unique process that the court offers.

Neighbourhoods' positive sentiments towards community courts are corroborated by the evidence collected, again, by the Department for Constitutional Affairs. The Department's research found that community residents' perceptions of safety had risen and, even more remarkably, that a majority of residents were willing to pay slightly increased taxes or to transfer money from other criminal justice agencies to fund the continuation of community courts. As a result of all that enthusiastic support for this innovative justice system, the United Kingdom's first community court opened its doors in January at the north Liverpool community justice centre. In the first six months after the court's introduction, north Liverpool experienced a decrease in crime, compared with the same time frame in the previous year.

Although Judge David Fletcher, who runs the community justice centre, is disparaged by some of the more conservative elements in the judiciary, he has emerged as an engaged community leader and personifies the success of the community court. My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs has described him as having "a very unique role of building community relationships across north Liverpool, as well as passing sentences and following cases through after conviction."

That personal element of the community courts prevents defendants from becoming alienated from the process and allows for true rehabilitation so that they have the option of becoming productive members of society. My right hon. and learned Friend has also said that the centre in Liverpool is "already making a difference by listening to local people and giving them an opportunity to get involved in reducing local crime."

If we are to generate capable charismatic judges who roll up their sleeves, step outside the comfort zone of a cosy judicial career ladder and are proactive in our communities, the Department needs to initiate fundamental cultural changes. It needs to start by revamping the monochrome judicial training and ensuring that judges have a lifetime engagement with the communities that they are meant to serve.

Over 18 years I have put a great deal of effort into trying to meet the judiciary in my own city, and I have managed to meet judges and others on only a handful of occasions. However, within five minutes of entering the judge's jurisdiction in Brooklyn, on my way to Red Hook, I was sitting at the top table watching him administer justice. He showed photographs to a defendant who was going through a drug rehabilitation scheme, but who was wobbling and perhaps thinking of leaving the scheme to go back on to the drugs. The judge showed the defendant pictures of himself taken 40 days earlier and asked, "Is that the sort of thing you want to return to? Do you really want to go back to looking like that?" That sort of direct follow-through communication with defendants should be looked at and replicated in the UK. Ensuring that our judges are more in tune with their communities does not for one second mean that they are less impartial or less independent; it simply means that they are more capable of delivering the justice that we need.

Community courts are gaining momentum in the United Kingdom, and many more communities, including those in Nottingham, are ready to embrace this innovative system of justice at a lower level. Although I would prefer there to be a single judge, if that option were available, we can look at other levels, too. The Salford community justice initiative recently opened, and community justice panels in Chard and Ilminster are now operational and continuing the trend of success that the community courts have repeatedly shown since their creation.

We are serious about getting the legal system to be a part of Nottingham. This morning the idea of community courts will be discussed at our local criminal justice board. We have seen the adverse effects of antisocial behaviour and criminality and the need for an integrated way of tackling those growing problems. On Monday on one of my local estates we will launch Operation Kingdom: a multi-agency approach, with the addition of dozen extra police officers, will go in to fill a vacuum created by the very positive arrests of some of the key villains in the east midlands. We are going in there with housing, social security, CCTV operatives and additional police personnel to ensure that that community can be helped to rebuild itself now that those significant arrests have taken place.

That community, and Operation Kingdom, would be a classic case for assistance at judicial and legal level, but at the moment those connections are not there. What would the people on the Bestwood estate give to have an active involved judge repairing the damage done by a decade of criminality by one key family? We need such people in our communities. We need the Minister to make every intellectual effect to see how she can spread those pilots further.

A community court in Bestwood, or in St. Ann's or the Meadows in the constituencies of my hon. Friends the Members for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell) and for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson) could be the spark that really makes our communities' fight-back unstoppable. We have had some adverse publicity in the city of Nottingham, some of it self-generated, but that would be a demonstration that Nottingham itself had thought this through, got everybody around the table and found another way to fight back and regenerate our communities.

In October, just to show that we are serious about this idea in our city, we had the privilege of playing host to district attorneys from Red Hook, who came to examine our magistrates and exchange notes on the best ways to deal with crime. They met our chief Crown prosecutor Kate Carty, and helped us to understand the steps that we need to take to make community courts a working reality for Nottingham. I invited those two female DAs from New York to the House of Commons and we had a chat here about the exciting possibilities, and how they had changed the community in Red Hook. The Crown prosecutor and I also took our case for community courts to Baroness Scotland, who is the relevant Home Office Minister. She, too, gave us encouragement and listened carefully to our ideas about the possible way forward for community courts in Nottingham.

I do not know whether I should have declared an interest at the beginning and I apologise if I have transgressed in any way, but I am the chairman of our local regeneration partnership in Nottingham, One Nottingham, which is the local strategic partnership charged with the regeneration of our city. Our priorities, too, tie in closely with ensuring that the legal system and the criminal justice system are a part of the revival and are not aloof and watching from afar. While maintaining their judicial integrity and independence, they should be in there with us helping us, as any other public institution would, to revive and revitalise some of the deprived areas in my constituency. The community court is a perfect fit in that regeneration strategy and it helps the legal system to play its part as a full and active partner in regenerating our communities.

One Nottingham stands ready to hold the ring for any proposals coming forward for our city. We would be available to discuss with Ministers or officials how that might best be done. To show the seriousness with which we are preparing for that possibility, a conference will be held in March in the city of Nottingham under the umbrella of the Magistrates Association and a local trust in order to take those ideas forward. I do not know whether it is right for me to invite my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister to address that conference, but I shall ask her diary secretary whether she is available. As always, she will be very welcome. We were sad that she was unable to attend a day that we had planned for her in Nottingham; it would have included a discussion about the concept of community courts. I blame my former colleagues in the Whips Office for that misadventure, but I hope to make up for it on another occasion.

It is understandable that the Government want to see the completed results of some of the UK pilot programmes. However, if she does not know already, the Minister needs to be told that we stand ready to move whenever we are given the signal. Empirical data and community feedback show that community courts are having some success. The sooner we in Nottingham can begin to take those strides forward, curbing antisocial behaviour and criminality in our communities, the better.

Some may say, "We can't afford a community court; we'll have to pay for a judge, and the housing and accommodation." But our communities, which already pay billions of pounds as a result of petty criminality—the costs of the police service, the Prison Service, drug rehab, the broken families, the poor, and low educational attainment—would not agree that we cannot afford those courts. They would probably say that we cannot afford not to have them. Indeed, the quality of life of those in my constituency who live in the large former council estates in the outer city is diminished daily. They live in fear of the crime caused by the local yobs and the dealers. They, too, would probably say that we cannot afford not to have those courts.

I look forward to the day when my constituency can witness an innovative court with a spirited and positive judge like the one whom I saw in Red Hook, and probably like the one in north Liverpool. We have the support of our local community and our regeneration body, and we are supported also by the Government's vast research on the matter.

Nottingham is more than ready to become a pioneer in the revolutionary field of community justice. We ask only that the Government give us the opportunity, as soon as possible, to establish a community court in Nottingham. We, too, can then begin to have a positive impact on regeneration. We do not want justice to be an alien concept unrelated to everyday life; we want justice to be delivered locally, and to be seen to be delivered locally. We hope that that will help rebuild confidence not only in our judicial system but in our social system. We believe that the courts and the law have a central role to play in the regeneration of our communities, and community courts are a key way of demonstrating that.

1.18 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on choosing to debate community courts. I admire the way in which he argued his cause. He made a strong case—and what we heard about in his short speech is just the tip of the iceberg. I know from discussions that I and my ministerial colleagues and officials have had with him that his work on this subject is based where it should be: he listens to what people are saying in his local community. The policy development is not being undertaken in an ivory tower, but is based on what his constituents are saying to him. It is therefore hugely important.

I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend's patient and measured approach. I appreciate that it must be hard for him—seeing the needs of his constituents and the downright urgency of the agenda that he is putting forward—when it sometimes takes a while to get ancient institutions to step forward and work together in different ways. I congratulate him on his patient persistence in taking this matter forward.

My hon. Friend made a point about the culture of the legal system, on which I can only agree. It is hard to believe that if we asked members of the communities whom we represent to design a system for resolving disputes and identifying criminal responsibility, they would conjure up the current system. I think that we all believe that many changes are needed—although many are already under way. The fact that something has been as it is for many hundreds of years is not a reason not to consider what it could do better.

My hon. Friend is right to say that we need to look at the courts and the legal system as a public service; the Secretary of State, Lord Falconer, strongly agrees with that point. That service is there to prevent crimes from being committed by acting as a deterrent, and to bring offenders to justice and punish them when crimes are committed. It is also there to resolve disputes within families that cannot be resolved outside court, and to resolve civil cases. Therefore it is a public service, and it needs to look outward more. That is the culture that Lord Falconer is leading forward from his position as Secretary of State.

My hon. Friend made several points about Red Hook. His point about multi-jurisdictionality—if that is not too long a word—was well made. Why do we have such a clear sense of the different silos of the civil and criminal jurisdictions? Many of the issues about which he spoke stray across those jurisdictions. He talked about people going out and taking photographs of damp conditions. There might be damp conditions in a block of flats. There might also be criminality there, problems with children not attending school as much as they should, and family problems. I agree with his suggestion, and thank him for making it, that we need to consider what the problems are and make the courts work to solve them, rather than making individuals or agencies go from pillar to post.

In the domestic violence court in Croydon, there are sometimes families who have family problems involving contact with children and decisions about property, as well as domestic violence issues. Why make one family go in front of two judges? Why not have all the facts go before one judge? That will happen in Croydon: one family, one judge. That idea needs to take root throughout the legal system—basing work around the problem, rather than making people go from pillar to post.

Mr. Allen: The multi-jurisdictional aspect is not merely internal to the law. In places such as Red Hook one can get drug rehab, child care and health care in the court building, and there is a children's court there, too. All sorts of facilities are satellites around the court, because it has become such an engine for the community.

In the UK we have the LIFT—local improvement finance trust—project in the health service, which means that a new building may contain not only a health centre, but a gymnasium and a local police station. I do not want to give my right hon. and learned Friend ideas—but on second thoughts, perhaps I do. Perhaps the Department for Constitutional Affairs should have a budget for an equivalent to the LIFT project, and consider doing similar experiments in the UK.

Ms Harman: That is an interesting point, which I will consider. My hon. Friend makes the point that in that community justice centre—it is not really a court building: it is more than that—there is drug rehabilitation provision and the like. I hope that as well as spending all the time that he does in his constituency and visiting Red Hook, he will visit north Liverpool community justice centre. I have not been to Red Hook, but I have been to north Liverpool, and his description of the judge at Red Hook reminded me of Judge David, as the community groups call him, of the north Liverpool community justice centre—out and about in jeans and a T-shirt with the community groups at the time of night when the community is particularly beset with problems because of kerb crawling and prostitution. I would like to take this opportunity to thank Judge David Fletcher for taking on his shoulders the responsibility for everyone's hopes and fears for community justice, and for his commitment to that.

When I was in Liverpool and met the community groups, I was struck by the fact that they have a sense of owning the judge, and why should they not? He is supposed to be providing justice in their community, and he does not fight shy of that; he knows that his working relationship with them helps him to understand what he has in front of him, and the right way to solve the problems. That is why, upstairs from the courthouse, there are drug and housing projects. On the same site there is a youth activities centre. That model is being developed there, and many of the community's hopes, and our hopes, rest on it. As I said, I hope that my hon. Friend will visit the centre.

My hon. Friend asked whether the initiative would be too expensive. Much of this initiative is about people seeing their work differently. Obviously, the more money that can be spent on it the better, but there is a possibility of change just because people see that they can do things differently. The domestic violence forum in Southend said that the judge from the family court was prepared to attend a meeting of the forum to hear about the effects of domestic violence, and that its members felt much more confidence as a result. I am sure that as a result, many more people were prepared to report domestic violence, because they felt that that person understood what was going on. My hon. Friend is right to say that this is a question of public confidence. He is also right to say that we need an opportunity for the wisdom of the community, which best knows the effects of the problems and how they can be solved, to be fed into the process. That means the judge and the community meeting, knowing each other and working together regularly.

My hon. Friend said that this initiative could unleash the spark that made the community fight back. We all know the reality of communities who just feel beaten. The community must be engaged to solve problems, but people will engage only if they feel that there are some prospects and some hope. My hon. Friend is right about that. He has asked for a community court in Nottingham, and he made a very powerful case. He also said that a conference was being prepared. Can it be on a Monday? It is much easier to escape the Whips on a Monday morning, and then I would be delighted to go. Community courts work well if the agencies are engaged—my hon. Friend has worked incredibly hard to make the agencies work together in Nottingham—and if the community is optimistic and prepared to engage. Again, he has led that process with his colleagues in the city.

I am sure that my hon. Friend's powerful case will elicit a positive response. I am also sure that in the meantime, what he is already doing is effecting change. He wants more and faster change for his constituents, and we in the Department for Constitutional Affairs, with our colleagues in the Home Office, want to work with him to help to deliver that, but make no mistake: he is already effecting change through those arguments.

We must consider what people want from the justice system and measure it not against what it used to do and what it does, but against what people want. Timeliness is an issue. People do not expect an ordinary assault to take eight months to come to court; they think that it is probably more reasonable if such a case comes to court within four weeks. That is the measure of the gap with which we have to deal. My hon. Friend is a champion of trying to remould the justice system into something that people want—and after all, they should have what they want. The justice system exists in their interests and they are paying for it; it is a necessary public service. We look forward to working with my hon. Friend in partnership on the public service reform agenda for the justice system.

Post Codes and Post Towns

1.30 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): I am grateful for the opportunity to introduce this debate on a subject that causes a great deal of grief to many of my constituents and, I am sure, to many others across the country. It is not a conventional political issue, but none the less it causes a great deal of local concern and there is an element of ministerial responsibility. There are two related problems: the issue of post codes and post towns, which, under the current system, is not open to change, and that of the postal address files—the so-called PAFs—which, in theory, can enjoy some flexibility but in practice enjoy little.

Looking back over the Hansard reports, I have discovered a long history of local concerns about addresses. It reached a peak in 2002, so much so that there was an exchange between Postcomm, the post office regulator, and the Post Office, which was persuaded to introduce a more flexible system—a code of conduct—for changing the postal address file at least. I have some feedback on how that system is or is not working.

From the outset, I want to say that I fully understand the need for a standardised system. We have 28 million or 30 million homes in this country, with hundreds of millions of letters flying backwards and forwards. It is obviously important for the efficiency of sorting and distribution that there is a standardised system of post codes that can be read by machine. I fully understand that and why there need to be rules and an element of inflexibility. My basic concern is that the way in which the system operates is wholly inflexible and I want to ask the Minister whether there is anything that he can do. He is indirectly accountable for the Post Office and one stage removed from the regulator. Can the Government do anything to help deal with the problem?

It might be helpful if I split the problem into two halves. The first is the issue of post codes and post towns, which are the inflexible part of the framework. The Post Office and the Royal Mail are clear that only in the most extreme circumstances can those be changed. That presents some serious practical problems, and I will enumerate a few that arise in my constituency.

One cluster of houses—about 250 homes—was transferred to my borough of Richmond and my constituency about 12 years ago. The address of those homes is Twickenham road, Twickenham. However, the Post Office requires the post code to be TW13. That requires the homes to be referred to as Hanworth, Feltham—the post town of Feltham is in another constituency and another borough, Hounslow. That causes a great deal of confusion. Delivery people—both postmen and delivery companies—see the road signs for Twickenham, but they have a letter addressed to Feltham so they do not know what to do with it. A great many letters and deliveries go astray, leading to confusion and inefficiency.

Feelings were sufficiently strong for residents to petition and they involved me in the process. We took the matter up with the Royal Mail and invoked the support of the consumer watchdog, Postwatch, which was strongly supportive. We received an unequivocal negative from the Royal Mail. All we were doing was asking it to update the post town system to reflect the change of administrative boundaries; it would not do it.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): I want to mention a specific point about the regulations that apply to Postwatch, and in my case to Postwatch Scotland, which arose when I was taking up an individual case. The residents in the upper Tweed part of my constituency have an ML12 post code, which relates to the post town of Biggar, and although there have been no issues such as those set out by the hon. Gentleman about delivery problems, there have been numerous other problems such as identification with the wrong local authority region, being omitted from telephone directories and the effect on insurance costs. Postwatch is unable to support a referendum among local residents if it does not solely relate to the quality of the postal service. That is a deficiency in the regulations.

Dr. Cable: The hon. Gentleman is right. I entirely recognise the problem that he describes. I am, perhaps, somewhat more fortunate than him in that the consumer watchdog took up an identical case in my constituency and Postwatch was severely ticked off by the Royal Mail, which wrote:

> "I am . . . surprised that Postwatch have offered their support given the contents of the Code of Practice."

The Post Office consumer watchdog was very firmly put in its place by the producers on that occasion. However, that is just one example; there are others.

In my constituency, there is a cluster of homes around the historic palace of Hampton Court. The residents live in the borough of Richmond, in the Twickenham area, but they are regarded by the Post Office as belonging to a Kingston post code—KT8—and are assigned the post town of East Molesey, which is a different community across the river in a different county, having no historical connection whatever. That causes great confusion. There is also part of a community named Whitton on the fringes of my constituency that has been allocated the post town of Hounslow, causing many comparable problems.

What are the problems? The hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) listed some of them. First, a great deal of mail and delivery goes astray. Residents such as those involved in the Twickenham road case cited examples of crucial legal documents, bank statements and bills being returned to sender because the postmen did not know what to do with them. Several residents have described being offered books of stamps by way of compensation. That is ironic because the whole justification for the Post Office maintaining its inflexible system is to maintain efficiency. This is an inefficiency for which there is, apparently, no redress.

As the intervention of the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale suggested, post codes are often linked to commercial services with the result that references in the Thomson directory are misleading. Insurance is often based on post codes. In one area of my constituency, the crime rate is quite low due to good, safe neighbourhood policing, but residents are given home and car insurance quotations on the basis of their post code, which is in a different borough that has a much higher level of crime. Therefore, they pay a direct financial penalty as a result of the arbitrary allocation of a post code.

There are more serious matters. After I had secured this debate, I received an e-mail from a Leeds councillor whom I had never met, but who had a very informative point. He wrote:

"I have several parts in my ward which, though in the Leeds . . . area, have Bradford postcodes. This causes confusion—sometimes highly dangerous—where people are taken to the 'wrong' A&E Dept in emergencies, have calls transferred to the wrong police division, and are initially refused Council services—not to mention the predictable problems with mail".

Quite apart from the matters of commercial service, postal delivery and emergency services, there is the subtle psychological issue of identity. I do not represent an area where that is a powerful concern, but I believe that the Isle of Wight, for example, is not recognised by the Post Office, which regards it as part of Southampton. There are parts of Wales and, no doubt, Scotland that have English post codes and post towns. People in those areas value their identities and are disconcerted by that discrepancy. There are all sorts of reasons why a degree of flexibility should be introduced into the system governing post codes and post towns, while recognising the need for standardisation. A better balance should be struck.

The second problem relates to an area where there should be more give in the system but, in practice, there is not. That is the system of Post Office address files under which a geographical identity can be added or subtracted. Subject to the rules suggested by the Post Office regulator, the Royal Mail will add those extra details, subject to a referendum. A change can be accepted if 50 per cent. of people vote in favour of it. Indeed, there is now a negative procedure in which a change that the Post Office recommends will be accepted if no more than 20 people object to it.

Despite the fact that there is now a democratic way of changing people's postal address file names, it does not work at all well in practice. There are some happy examples, however. A small town near Barnsley in Yorkshire managed to change its postal address file name as a result of a campaign led by the umpire Dickie Bird, an example that is often cited to me as a model of what is possible. A counter example from Whitton, a town in my area, has aroused very strong feelings and has given rise to a petition of several thousand signatures, which I shall deliver to the Minister and the Royal Mail.

My constituency is made up of many urban villages and towns. Whitton has a very strong sense of identity and history. It has five schools, four churches and a railway station. Ordnance survey maps going back 150 years refer to it. At its centre is the famous Kneller hall, the home of the Royal Military School of Music. There is a very powerful community association and a very active business association. There are also annual carnivals and much else. Its name, however, has been removed from the postal address file, which has had very serious consequences.

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): Such is the logic of the hon. Gentleman's remarks that I hesitate to intervene, but does he accept that Whitton has never been on the Royal Mail's postal address file and so has never been eliminated, as he says it has been in his rather dramatic press release? Does he also accept that correspondence advising the citizens of Whitton how to petition and allow the change to be implemented has never been pursued, and that it would be more sensible to use the process rather than to petition?

Dr. Cable: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong about several facts, but we shall return to them. We used the process, but the Post Office refused us support for the change. That is why the democratic election choice was impossible, although we would be very happy to use it. The local council supports it, the MP supports it, which is one of the conditions, the chamber of commerce supports it, and the local community very much wants to have a ballot, as the code requires.

The Minister is right to suggest that I used slightly colourful language in saying that Whitton was "eliminated", and that it was probably never included in the first place, but the situation has become more serious in that increasing numbers of commercial vehicles are using the postal address file while Thomson directories' maps, for example, no longer refer to Whitton. The telephone directory gives Twickenham, a town four miles away, as the address. Local atlases do not refer to Whitton at all.

Some of the practical problems that arise as a result are quite serious. Delivery vans often turn up in the borough looking for, say, Kneller road in Whitton, but all the directories refer to it as Kneller road in Twickenham, so they look in Twickenham, which is four miles away. Deliveries very often go astray, and a great deal of inconvenience is caused to businesses and individuals. Associated with that is a very strong sense that the identity of a community is being lost, and all the community groups are now pressing for a change.

The Minister said that the local communities have not used the appropriate methods, but there has been extensive correspondence, which I can show him, in which the local community associations and I have pressed the Royal Mail to hold a ballot to make the necessary change. The Royal Mail has simply refused to support the change. The reasons that it has given, which the consumer watchdog describes as inflexible, bear no relationship to the standard arguments that it advances about the need for a sophisticated computer-based sorting system. It refers to the confusion that could arise among the manual sorters. It is difficult to understand the arguments. Indeed, the Post Office consumer body, which has no axe to grind—there is no reason for it to support us—takes much the same view. However, if the Minister thinks that all that is required is for the local community to activate the process, we shall be delighted to do that. The key bodies, the council, the chamber of commerce and I are all in favour and anxious to achieve the necessary change.

To conclude, I ask two things of the Minister. First, is it possible to have some flexibility in relation to post codes and post towns, rather than the current rigid refusal to contemplate change? I understand about economies of scale and the need for standardisation, but surely some kind of cost-benefit analysis must be made. There are severe costs in some cases—the 250 homes in Twickenham road that I cited make a good example. Can we not have some mechanism by which the Royal Mail is required to evaluate costs and benefits, and to allow a process of change?

Secondly, we seem to have run into the buffers in relation to the PAFs—I mentioned the example of Whitton. There is a process for change, but if the Post Office refuses to contemplate it, it is difficult to use it. Can the Minister help by finding a way around that obstacle?

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): I am grateful for the opportunity to respond to the debate, and I shall try to address all the points raised by the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable). However, I urge him to be more accurate in future press releases, rather than chasing the quick headline.

I share instinctively his view of the importance of place, and his feeling that identity as a community and as a society depends largely on having a sense of place. It follows that, as community animals, we will want any post code to reflect both place and community. However, let us reflect on purpose: what is the post code for? What is the point of a post town?

As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, the Royal Mail manages a massive operation that extends to every house and business in the United Kingdom. Its operational success is based on the efficient use of postal addresses, particularly post codes. Some 84 million postal items are delivered every day, and more than 950 million parcels every year. To meet its obligation to provide a universal postal service, Royal Mail has given every house and business in the UK a postal address. There are 27.5 million addresses and 1.7 million post codes, one for every 15 UK addresses.

Why has Royal Mail specified a correct way of addressing post to help its operations? Every delivery point in the UK has a postal address. Customers are encouraged to use the correct postal address, for the simple purpose of avoiding delays. A minimum amount of information is required by Royal Mail for accurate sorting and delivery: the addressee's name, the house number or name, the locality name, the town and the post code. The post code enables small numbers of adjacent properties—sometimes a single property—to be identified. The Royal Mail's postal address file—the PAF, to which the hon. Gentleman referred—also includes other information relevant to a postal address, such as the names of businesses. The file is subject to continuous updating to reflect changes in postal address information such as new housing developments and the renumbering of buildings or renaming of roads.

A post code is not a definition of personal or communal identity, it is a sorting and routing instruction. Its sole purpose in the postal context is to help to identify the most efficient route for delivering mail to customers. Society might use it in a variety of other ways, but that is what it is for, and why it was designed in the first place.

David Mundell: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Alun Michael: No. The hon. Gentleman really ought to check protocol before he seeks to intervene in an Adjournment debate.

The post code allocated to each district and address is linked to Royal Mail's network of sorting and delivery offices. It was never intended to signify a geographically definitive address by local authority or other administrative boundary. Indeed, it is not a geographically accurate description of where a property is located, which explains some of the examples given by the hon. Member for Twickenham. It might include the name of the town where the delivery office is situated, which might be several miles away, or even in a different county.

I said that I instinctively shared the hon. Gentleman's affection for the identity of place, and the situation can be even worse, in that the town referred to by the post code might even be in a different country. Places such as Llanrhaeadr-ym-Mochnant have what appears to be an Oswestry post code and address. That can be a bit disconcerting, unless one accepts Owain Glyndwr's world view, in which case not only Oswestry, but Exeter, Gloucester and Leicester as well, are in Wales. However, the post code is not about perception or community, or even national identity; it is about delivery.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the use of the name Whitton, but that has never been a post town, as used by Royal Mail under the postal address file; it is used as a locality in the Twickenham post town area, so it follows that it has not been "eliminated" as such. Currently, it is used only it is if required to identify similarly named streets in the Twickenham area, such High street, Whitton, Twickenham.

Royal Mail received a request from a resident of the Whitton area in November 2004 asking for Whitton to be reinstated in the addresses of the area. It was explained that Whitton was not required as part of the postal address for the efficient delivery of mail, but that the code of practice allowed for its inclusion if certain criteria determined in the code were met. The three criteria are that inclusion of the name would not have an adverse affect on Royal Mail services—in other words, that the primary purpose of using names was met—that support for the change is obtained from customer representatives for the area, and that a clearly defined set of geographical boundary data are provided.

That would have allowed Royal Mail to undertake a consultation with affected residents, and if less than 20 per cent. objected, Whitton would have been included as a locality in the Twickenham post town area. Royal Mail never received a response to its letter. The residents of Whitton still have that option available to them. The hon. Member for Twickenham might feel that he gets a good deal of publicity locally by drawing up a petition, but as I have said, there is an avenue open to him to achieve the change, if it has the support that he claims.

Dr. Cable: May I point out for the record that there was extensive correspondence with Royal Mail in 2003, the year before that letter was sent? It explored all the options, but Royal Mail specifically refused to allow a democratic ballot.

Alun Michael: I have given the hon. Gentleman the reply, and I think that he is wriggling. I suggest that he use the process, rather than asking for it to be changed. It would make provision for Whitton to be included, if such a change had the support that he suggests.

As I said, I instinctively accept that there can be problems with other uses, or the sense of location, if the purpose of the post code is misunderstood. That can sometimes affect the perceptions of an area. If other organisations—whether private or public, or in central or local government—decide to use post codes for other purposes, they must recognise and take account of the limitations of the PAF and post codes. Postcomm's 2003 consultation on the issue concluded that it was not reasonable to hold Royal Mail responsible for the use to which other bodies put the information that it provided. If there is evidence of a problem caused by the way in which the PAF is used by third parties, it should be brought to the attention of the authority with responsibility for the service in question.

The UK post code system was developed by Royal Mail in the 1960s to sort mail more efficiently, and to cope with population growth and increasing mail volumes. Efficiency is achieved by using the one-line post code as a shortcut for the full postal address. In an electronic age, the advantages of that must be manifest to everybody. If other organisations use the post code system for other purposes, they need to understand properly the way in which the post code system is constructed. They also need to understand that although flexibility seems attractive, it would result in a large number of complaints if it led to confusion in the delivery of mail. Mail with a post code can be sorted more quickly, accurately and efficiently. The alphanumeric combination used in the UK post code structure has proved robust, resilient and easy for mail users and the public to remember. That is why the UK has one of the highest levels of post code use in the world.

Royal Mail continues to develop and maintain high standards of post code compliance. That has a direct influence on its mail processing efficiency. Its automated sorting systems, address interpretation and optical character recognition machinery function by matching addresses against the postal address file. The routes taken by the men and women who deliver our post throughout the country are similarly devised on the basis of the postal address file.

The code of practice was adopted by Postcomm in 2001 to govern changes to Royal Mail's post code address file. It was reviewed in 2004 and adopted by Royal Mail. Under that code of practice, changes can be made for two reasons: first, to maintain or improve the service offered by Royal Mail—I am sure that that would have the support of everybody in this Chamber—and secondly, to reflect consumer demand. In the first case, Royal Mail can review the way in which it routes its mail to provide a better service. That may happen as a result of the siting of a new delivery office, new housing or business development, or the renumbering of buildings or renaming of roads by local authorities. In such cases, Royal Mail reviews existing post codes or addresses to maintain efficient handling and delivery.

Under the code of practice, Royal Mail will also consider requests from customers for changes to postal addresses. Locality information can be changed if the request is widely supported by customer representatives, such as Postwatch, local authorities, parish or district councils and Members of Parliament. An acceptable and clearly defined set of geographical boundary data must be available and there should be no significant level of objection from those affected by the proposed change of address.

In that event, Royal Mail writes to all affected addresses to advise them of the proposed change, giving customers who are likely to be affected the opportunity to register concerns or objections. As I have already indicated, if fewer than 20 per cent. of those affected register objections, the change can be made with immediate effect under the fast track system introduced in the code in 2004. If 20 per cent. or more of those affected raise objections, Royal Mail will carry out a poll of all households affected by the change. The decision on the change is based on a simple majority ruling. Royal Mail aims to conclude such polls and implement any address changes within two months of the ballot.

Changes to post towns affect a large number of addresses and have widespread implications. A post town acts as a clearing point for a particular district, so it is the basic unit of the postal delivery system. However, as I have indicated, that has implications for the perceptions of identification of localities, which sometimes go across not only local authority boundaries but even national boundaries. Royal Mail will consider requests for changes to post towns only when an area is being recoded to meet an operational need.

The post code forms the basis of Royal Mail's distribution network. Any change to post codes could compromise Royal Mail's operations, resulting in a poorer service to customers. We should be hesitant about introducing anything that would undermine the consistency of the service. Royal Mail will consider making changes to the last two characters of a post code in exceptional circumstances, but before it does, it requires evidence that all those affected by the change are in favour of it.

It is for the individual initiating such a request to obtain the necessary support. That is because Royal Mail's primary concern is to ensure that it can deliver mail efficiently to its customers. It will not consider making changes to the postal addresses that do not serve to improve its operational efficiency. I am sure that the hon. Member for Twickenham and others will, if they consider that process, accept that the first and most important consideration must be that Royal Mail is able to deliver an effective service in undertaking its responsibilities to deliver to all properties throughout the country.

Housing Benefit Pathfinders

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Heppell.]

9.30 am

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Not having expertise in housing, my attention was drawn to the housing benefit pathfinders for three reasons when they were announced in 2002. First, housing benefit issues featured in my Redcar constituency surgeries. The system appeared to be complex and administered slowly, and people were getting into trouble because things were taking so long. However, there is no particular reason to think that Redcar council is poor at dealing with such matters.

Secondly, I thought of what I shall call the impact of the system on South Bank—a wonderful community in the old-fashioned sense in my constituency. Everyone knows each other and, although they might not all love each other, there is a strong sense of belonging to the town. Victorian terraces were built adjacent to a nearby steelworks, which has long since closed down and been demolished, although I am happy to say that we still have a strong steel industry in the constituency. When someone dies or a void occurs for one reason or another in those Victorian terraces—people might move out of South Bank to get off-street parking and a garden, which, one guesses, are major features missing from such areas—that void is hard to fill. There is no obvious market for those houses.

As the voids increase in number, the houses are bought in job lots by absent landlords. People in Redcar always say that the landlords live in London, from where all evil emanates. The houses are let on the sole condition that those who rent them are on housing benefit. The landlords have never seen the houses, let alone ever been to South Bank. They have no intention of maintaining the property and no interest in the conduct of the tenant, who often, since he is lives in a hard-to-fill area, has probably made himself less than welcome elsewhere. No good from that syndrome comes to the people of that good old-fashioned community in South Bank.

It is slightly ironic and very odd that the remoteness of the method of paying for rented accommodation—in housing benefit—seems to contribute to that. The money is paid by Redcar council and goes to London, many miles away, and neither the landlord nor the tenant has any interest in or connection with the community. I accept that the argument is slightly overextended, but I began to perceive housing benefit and how it is paid as capable of damaging such a community.

The third reason for my attention being drawn to the project is that Middlesbrough was invited to be a pathfinder. Although hon. Members might think that it is famous for its football club, its real claim to fame is that it is next door to Redcar. Middlesbrough declined that opportunity, because the same voids exist on both sides of the border between Redcar and Middlesbrough, and it was feared that, if people in Middlesbrough received generous amounts of money in their hands, the effect on the rented market in Redcar could be damaging. There would have been a flight of tenants to the pathfinder area, so, for that reason, Middlesbrough—and, for all I know, others—declined that opportunity.

Although I followed that argument, I was sorry that I had no closer prospect of seeing how such a pilot scheme would work. However, others have been monitoring these schemes and it is possible to see some emerging passions. [Interruption.] I apologise, I mean patterns. There is not much passion on a wintry December morning in Westminster Hall.

I should say for the sake of clarity that I am not a housing expert, but let me explain how the new local housing allowances work. Instead of an individual valuation being done on each property, the allowances are paid on the basis of the average rent in a broad rental market area. The average rent is calculated by the Rent Service—as I understand it, on the basis that each broad rental market area has at least two distinct residential areas. It takes off the lowest and the highest rents, and averages out the remaining rents. That is reviewed monthly and, in greater depth, quarterly.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. and learned Friend is right to explain the notional way of calculating the rent for an area, but is she surprised to know that in a good number of areas fewer than 10 per cent. of available houses are available at the standard rent or lower? Sometimes the calculations are clearly adrift of what is happening in the local housing market.

Vera Baird: I imagine that my hon. Friend says that from his experience of his own locality, which he may be going to tell us more about. From the reports that I have had an opportunity to read, I think that the picture is variable. Sometimes the local housing allowance is generous and people can move up or pocket some of it; sometimes it is insufficient. I accept that it is a function of averaging that that is likely to happen, but it is important that there is sufficient fine tuning so that no one is disadvantaged.

The next characteristic of the local housing allowance is that it is paid to the tenant, not the landlord. As I have just said, if it is higher than the rent, the tenant can either keep it or move to a better property; if it is lower, he either has to make the rent up or move to what I suppose one would have to call a more appropriate property. The other point about the local housing allowance is that the amount is published, so people know what they will get in a particular area.

The primary point of the scheme is to try to drive personal responsibility and financial inclusion. That must be said to have worked in the pilot areas. According to Citizens Advice, 93 per cent. of people have now opened bank accounts, although not without some difficulties in the first instance and some continuing difficulties. A further purpose is to remove any stigma attached to being a recipient of housing benefit, whose rent was paid for as a sort of welfare case.

[Vera Baird]

Now individuals have their own money in their pocket. The scheme also must enhance flexibility in the sense that if a person were offered a job somewhere, historically they would have had more difficulty in moving than will be permitted by having the local housing allowance in their pocket.

David Taylor: Mine is not a pathfinder area, but I observe what is happening elsewhere. My hon. and learned Friend will acknowledge that, despite the successes, there are a fair number of occasions and examples involving people on a low income using housing benefit payments to cover other bills, instead of prioritising rent payments. As a consequence, some landlords—corporate landlords of the sort that she may be suggesting operate in South Bank—are withdrawing from this market.

Vera Baird: Yes, I am aware that there have been some withdrawals and that there might be some potential withdrawals. I imagine that the situation with vulnerable tenants would be worse if we were considering this system in the social rented sector, which I will come to in due course. I acknowledge that what my hon. Friend refers to has been something of a feature, although things have not been as bad as was expected at first. The point is that if the money is no longer paid directly to the landlord, the landlord has less guarantee of its receipt and less certainty that his income stream will continue uninterrupted.

The pilot schemes have been observed by the Department for Work and Pensions, Shelter, to which I am indebted for its report "On the right path?", and Citizens Advice—I have had a chance to read its report, "Early days". I am also indebted to the National Landlords Association, with which I had a conversation earlier this week. It represents about 7,500, mainly smaller, landlords. Of course, we are considering the pilot schemes about half way through the two years—they have been running for a year.

The first thing that drew my attention to the schemes was the issue of complexity in processing and the delays in getting housing benefit. It appears that, broadly speaking, that has improved, although there are some staggering figures. In Edinburgh, it takes 38 days less to process a local housing allowance application than it took to process a housing benefit application before the pilots. In Leeds, however, processing seems to be taking 35 days more.

There are some extraordinary results, but, by and large, it seems that the processing is being done more quickly. That is significant because delay can lead to debt and bank charges. It is important to have a bank account so that the money can be paid in and the direct debit can go out. That complexity needs addressing. For example, Post Office card accounts cannot have direct debits, so one has to get a proper bank account, although identification is sometimes a difficulty. It is a key point that the administration of that benefit should be done quickly, and there are signs that it has improved.

I am told by the National Landlords Association that landlords tend to make a business decision about whether to rent in the housing benefit sector. If they decide to do so, they accept that they will get the rent monthly in arrears, not up front. However, they think it will be paid steadily once they have started to receive it. Clearly, therefore, processing delays will now become more of a factor in blocking landlords' willingness to go along with housing benefit tenants, because landlords have no ultimate guarantee. That guarantee was their payback for waiting for processing delays to work their way through in the first place.

There is a default position: if a tenant is eight weeks in arrears with their local housing allowance paying the rent, it is resolved back to being paid into the hands of the landlord rather than those of the tenant. I have referred to the extent to which Leeds has increased the processing time—on average, it takes 69 days. That is very nearly 10 weeks, which means that, theoretically, anyone who applies for local housing allowance in Leeds will, by not having paid their eight weeks' rent, default before they even start. That is not a good way to start a new relationship with a landlord. That is worrying and it points up the fact that delays in administration must be conquered, although they are going in the right direction.

Next year, as a consequence of the Housing Act 2004, there will be one or more tenancy deposit schemes, which I imagine will become more important, granted that payment is not so easily guaranteed under local housing allowances. My understanding from Shelter is that the demand for tenancy deposits has increased from 66 to 75 per cent., presumably so that landlords might feel more reassured that at least that money is available. If the fear is of a flight of landlords—granted the lack of guarantee in the local housing allowance—it is important that tenancy deposit schemes are up and running quickly to reassure landlords and forestall any flight from the housing benefit sector.

A tenancy deposit scheme does not make it any easier for a person who does not have any money to find the deposit, but I am clear about the fact that the homelessness directorate of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is encouraging local authorities to fund deposit guarantee schemes. They will be important in giving people the flexibility to move, following their local housing allowance. That will also give some support and encouragement to landlords. It is important to process quicker, and that the guarantees from a deposit scheme come into play fairly quickly.

There is already some evidence of flight by landlords from renting to the housing benefit sector. Shelter noted a slight upward trend in landlords advertising, "No tenants on housing benefit." Its deeper research showed that there are more landlords who, although they do not advertise that they will not have people on housing benefit, do not take on such applicants. One landlord in four is not happy to take someone on housing benefit, apparently, but Shelter did not register that as representing a significant increase in the rate of refusal of housing benefit tenants as compared with the situation before the introduction of the local housing allowance.

The National Landlords Association says that there has been no flight from letting to housing benefit tenants within the organisation. However, Department for Work and Pensions research, published on 3 November, pointed to a marked withdrawal by corporate landlords, whose numbers are small but whose portfolios are large.

Individual landlords noted an increase in demand for letting, presumably as a consequence of the withdrawal of some corporate landlords. The general estimate across the three reports to which I have referred appears to be that about 10 per cent. less property is available for the housing benefit sector. That would be serious if it were replicated nationwide.

I want to discuss another element of that. Something that might help to resist further flight by landlords is the injection of better choice into how local housing allowance can be used. At the moment, it must be paid to the tenant and there is no real choice of having it paid direct to the landlord, although there is the default position that I mentioned: if someone has not paid their rent for eight weeks, it is automatically redirected to the landlord.

There is a test of vulnerability, however, and if someone is vulnerable due to some external factor, or has a history of not paying rent or already has debt, the money can be paid direct to the landlord if the local authority so certifies. However, that removes an element of choice, and because part of the point of the scheme is to give people choice and to make them exercise responsibility over their finances, it seems incompatible that tenants do not have the choice of having money paid direct from the local authority to the landlord. Perhaps that should be looked at.

Of course, tenants must be protected from there being conditions in the leasing agreement requiring their rent to be paid direct, and we must resist any prospect of landlords pressurising tenants into having the rent paid direct, but it is likely that that could be achieved, perhaps through a balancing mechanism established with the local authority. We picture landlords as dreadful people, but that is often completely false, and tenants and landlords have a close relationship and are on good terms. The ability to guarantee the landlord the rent on the basis of personal choice, sanctioned by the local authority, might further empower tenants and, in addition, give landlords some guarantee and perhaps impede any further flight.

I understand that a growing sector of landlordism these days consists of relatively young people who buy a property to let, considering it their security, rather than paying into a pension fund. In such circumstances, if there is no guarantee under the local housing allowance that the rental income will be paid regularly, the landlord's mortgage may be undermined and they might be put in real difficulty.

At the moment, if someone cannot pay rent regularly because they are vulnerable, it can be paid direct. If someone will not pay, or just does not want to pay, there is no way of having rent paid direct to the landlord. I am indebted to the Library for putting together a press pack for this debate, which contains a good deal of information. It refers in particular to the Grimsby area, where some people allegedly spent their local housing allowance on drugs, beer or holidays in Spain, although I do not know why there is a reference to Spain in particular. Such things will happen from time to time, and tenants are more vulnerable if they are susceptible to temptation of that sort, but if payments were made direct, at least they would not be without a roof when they returned from Spain. The element of choice needs to be looked at and perhaps adjusted in the mutual interest of tenants and landlords.

Rent can be paid direct now if someone proves their own vulnerability, which is a curious notion. It is self-evident that the most vulnerable people will be least able to demonstrate their vulnerability. Requiring someone who is vulnerable but completely compos mentis and together to go to their local authority to try to prove that they are sufficient of a fool that they cannot manage their own rent is also curious. The test of vulnerability is odd and needs to be reconfigured.

There is a report in the Citizens Advice research on the project of someone who wanted to have her rent paid direct and to admit that she was vulnerable because, historically, she had been unable to manage her finances well. However, she was too afraid to do that because she thought that social services might use it as leverage and a reason to take her child away. One can imagine how such concern could arise. That shows that better criteria are necessary if rent is to be paid direct, if that is what people want and it is in everybody's interest.

The new system does not appear to have caused significant rent inflation, although it seems fairly rational to say that there should be some rent inflation if the local housing allowance is worked out as the average rental and is higher than rents that are being demanded. Some landlords have increased their rents to local housing allowance level, but there do not seem to have been significant affordability issues for tenants—although I hear what my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) says about a pathfinder he observed—and, according to the reports, homelessness does not appear to have increased. There has been a 93 per cent. take-up of bank accounts, which must be a good step towards financial inclusion for a lot of formerly excluded people.

This scheme has been well resourced. The local housing allowances have been decent and, in many cases, the pathfinders have also involved contracts with advice agencies such as citizens advice bureaux—smoothing the way with landlords, explaining why there are delays, and helping applicants to get their processing done and to get a bank account. Without that, it seems highly likely that the scheme would have been significantly less successful.

With those few adjustments, the scheme is broadly to be welcomed. I am interested to know what the Minister and other hon. Members think of such possible ways of preventing a disastrous flight from the supply of housing. Over time, I hope, people will become more responsible with their money due to this mechanism, although I do not know how the problem will evolve.

The sector involves some 500,000 people on housing benefit; the social rented sector involves another 3.5 million people. I understand that there is an intention at least to consult on, or perhaps to pilot, rolling out local housing allowances in the social rented sector. I am interested to hear what the Minister has to say, because there is a much higher proportion of vulnerable people in the social rented sector. Pensioners, for example, are vulnerable for a range of reasons—it is not that they are profligate, particularly—and as people age and become weaker and less able to manage their affairs, it is key that they should not fall into debt for any such reason.

There are a lot of vulnerable people generally in the social rented sector, and major landlords in it fear that the lack of a guarantee could compromise rental income streams for registered social landlords, which would increase borrowing costs over the long term and perhaps cause difficulty. There may be stronger reservations about rolling out the scheme into the social rented sector, and I would be pleased to know what others think.

In my much-loved South Bank in the Redcar constituency, a lot of people who own houses are poor none the less, but they get no significant support with their housing costs. They certainly do not get such a benefit. Is not that an anomaly, particularly in such a setting, where people do not have a great deal of capital value protecting them? In derelict housing market areas such as the one I have described, capital values just collapse, so it is not as if people have property that they could realise in order to support themselves.

I broadly welcome the local housing allowances. I hope that they will be rolled out soon, and that Middlesbrough and Redcar will be included. For the reason that Middlesbrough chose not to become a participant in a pathfinder, it is important that there is a systematic way of rolling the schemes out so that availability in one local authority does not damage the housing market in an adjacent authority.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. For the benefit of Members, I intend to call the Front Benchers from about 10.25 am. There should be ample time to accommodate those who want to speak.

9.54 am

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): We are grateful to the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) for raising this subject this morning. She said that she is not a housing expert, but, if I may say so, she did jolly well. I am not a housing expert, but as I was a Minister with responsibility for housing for 10 years, I was one—or I certainly hope that I was. It is residual memories of that experience that prompted my interest in this morning's debate.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar is right to raise this subject, because many in this Chamber know that, in the early 1990s, an apparently innocuous change to housing benefit was passed and was implemented on 1 April of a given year. Shortly afterwards, our postbags were full of complaints and the whole system had to be revisited. In a moment, I will say a word or two about a reform that has some comparison with the one we are discussing: the community charge. I put down a warning to Ministers about that.

This debate is being responded to by a Minister from the Department for Work and Pensions, whose presence I welcome. There is inevitably some tension between the DWP's view and that of Housing Ministers when it comes to housing policy, particularly when the payment for housing policy comes not from the Housing Minister's budget but from someone else's. I hope that the Minister will be able to say that he speaks as one with his colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, who have responsibilities for housing policy. There have been tensions in the past.

I want to pick up a point that the hon. and learned Lady raised at the end of her remarks about the Government's intention to roll this scheme out to registered social landlords. The arguments for doing so are weaker than they are in relation to the private rented sector, because extortionate rents are not being underpinned and there is no need to require people to shop around.

I hope that the Minister will consult those who provide the funding for housing associations—the Council of Mortgage Lenders and other institutions. They are interested in the cash flow of housing associations, to whom they advance funds. If, for the sake of argument, there was evidence that the scheme might slow down the cash flow and have some impact on bad debts, that would not stop them lending to housing associations, but it would affect the rate at which that lending was made. That would in turn have an impact on the output of social housing.

The Joseph Rowntree Foundation pointed out last week that fewer new social houses are currently being built than at any time since the 1920s. I do not think anybody would want to introduce a policy that further reduced the supply of social rented housing. I hope that the Minister will give an assurance that if the Government are to roll out the scheme to the RSLs, they will consult mortgage lenders and others to ensure that it does not damage the supply of such private rented housing.

I have had informal consultations with the housing association in my constituency, Testway, which is a large-scale voluntary transfer organisation. I discussed the matter with tenants and the housing association. They are concerned about the impact if the policy were to be rolled out to social landlords. I agree with what the hon. and learned Lady just said about the potential disadvantages if that were to be carried out.

I mentioned a moment ago that the policy had something in common with the community charge. Before the community charge was rolled out in England, which, I hasten to say, I voted against, those on low incomes had 100 per cent. of their rates paid direct to the local authority. They were not troubled by the rates. When the community charge was introduced, they were asked to pay roughly 10 per cent. They got that through their benefit and what they received was based on the average.

The theory was that that would act as an incentive to vote for prudent local authorities, so that the average that they received left them in pocket if they had a prudent local authority. The policy was not a thundering success. It failed mainly because it was regressive. People should not forget the administrative chaos that accompanied the introduction of the community charge. The money was paid through their benefit to people on low incomes—they got their 10 per cent.—but it did not find its way to the local authority, because it had other priorities and there were lots of bad debts. There is a risk of that particular feature of the community charge being replicated in this particular social policy unless precautions are taken.

Another point I want to make is that if one listens to the policy of the Government, one would think they were keen on choice. In their education and health policies, parents' choice and patients' choice are key elements. However, this policy removes choice, as the hon. and learned Lady said. People will have no choice. Instead of people opting to have their rent paid directly to their landlord, the money will be given to them, unless they can prove that they are vulnerable. To that extent, this sits uneasily with the vocabulary of the Government, which is pro-choice, because this is a social reform that removes choice.

The hon. and learned Lady also mentioned the potential impact on the supply of private rented housing. One of the housing policy successes of the past 15 years has been the revival in private renting. There has been all-party agreement on the tenure form—the assured tenancy. The percentage of housing stock that is privately rented has shot up; speaking from memory, I would say that it has risen from about 5 per cent. to well into double figures. It would be sad if that revival were arrested because a change in the way housing benefit was paid led to private landlords withdrawing from the market, particularly in respect of the supply of houses to those on low incomes who for whatever reason are not a priority with local authorities, but who can currently get good quality accommodation from the private rented sector.

The community charge ended with the downfall of the then Prime Minister. I do not know whether the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions is hatching a sinister plot to bring forward the departure of the present Prime Minister by steaming ahead with a social policy that will have the same outcome, but he and his colleagues would be well advised to think it through before they steam ahead.

My final point comes from helpful analysis by the citizens advice bureaux. They made a clear recommendation about the rate for the under-25s, who have a lower rate in respect of entitlement. Is the Minister minded to accept that recommendation? Does he smile sympathetically on it?

To pick up a point of the hon. and learned Lady, a lot of resources went into the pathfinders. I expect that that helped to minimise the damaging fallout from the policy. Unless the same amount of resources is invested in the roll-out of this scheme, and unless the allowances are pitched at a fairly generous rate, the outcome now will be worse than in the pathfinders. If the Treasury has anything to do with this—I am sure it will—it will be anxious that the average rate is not pitched at too high a level. There will also be some drift, as the hon. and learned Lady said, and in respect of local rents what is the average will become the floor. What is the Minister's reaction to the CABs' sensible recommendations? Will he give an assurance that if and when this scheme is rolled out, the CABs' recommendations will be an integral part of the roll-out policy?

10.3 am

Mr. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): It is always an honour to follow the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), who spoke with obvious authority and experience as a former Housing Minister.

I thank my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) for securing the debate, and I am grateful for being allowed to speak briefly in it. Her constituency is next door but one to mine—just a brief hop over the Tees—and the experiences of her constituents in Redcar are similar to those of mine in Hartlepool. I want to touch on two areas that she mentioned—the scheme's effect on antisocial behaviour, and the need for financial inclusion and the subsequent education of people to help to promote that—although I will not be able to deal with them with her assurance and eloquence.

The housing benefit pathfinder scheme promotes fairness, simplicity and transparency in the benefit system. It promotes financial responsibility for the tenant on housing benefit, but—this is crucial—also imposes a degree of responsibility on the landlord, which the traditional housing benefit does not. There is a requirement under the pathfinder scheme to make the landlord, for his or her own financial gain, ensure that the housing benefit has been received from the tenant and to chase the matter up if the rent has not been paid.

In my constituency, as in Redcar and many other northern industrial towns, decent areas have been destroyed by absentee landlords who do not know where Hartlepool is, let alone where in the town their particular property is located. Those landlords could not care less about the social repercussions of putting—let me be frank—antisocial scum in an area, thereby blighting the lives of decent residents.

I hold weekly constituency surgeries. Last Friday, a couple came to see me. They had lived in their property for some 40 years; they had raised their children there, and they now enjoyed their grandchildren coming to visit. In the past two years, private absentee landlords—from where, I am not certain, although I am tempted to say "that there London"—have bought the properties on either side of the couple's house. Now, day after day and night after night, this decent man and woman have to put up with 24-hour drug-dealing, noise and threats of violence. Accompanying that is the terrifying ordeal of their neighbour banging the walls all night and threatening to kill them, although they have not even met.

This couple now want to move out of their home of 40 years, because they are frightened of possible repercussions should they complain about these antisocial tenants. They are not the only ones. I could mention a range of areas in the centre of Hartlepool, populated by good people who wish to improve their community by participating in such groups as the West End and Hartwell residents' associations, but whose areas are being damaged when a thoughtless and often absentee landlord puts—again, let me be frank—all manner of yobs into their property. That is not right.

I passionately believe that landlords have a responsibility to ensure that their tenants respect their neighbours and the community in which their property is rented. I want the pathfinder scheme to be extended to my constituency, so that those committing criminal and antisocial behaviour get it into their heads that they cannot go around taking the mick out of decent people—or worse, making those people fear for their personal safety—but that if they do, they stand a good chance of being evicted.

Should the landlord be forced to take a greater role and assume more responsibility for getting the rent, that will have a positive impact. I know that residents in those areas of Hartlepool that I mentioned would like the landlord to be required to visit their property to receive rent, checking that the property is in good repair and that no antisocial behaviour is taking place. I accept that that may be impractical in many cases, but I see benefits to the community even when a direct debit or standing order is used. The tenant can stop that payment if financial resources are tight. The landlord therefore needs to maintain some awareness of the tenant and his or her behaviour, which has not previously been the case.

I want to convey that main point, but will finish by saying that we need to provide additional financial education for tenants participating in the pathfinder scheme. The aims of the local housing allowance, as outlined by the Government, are generally to be supported. The scheme simplifies complex housing benefit regulations and, importantly, provides an element of fairness, which had hitherto been lacking.

Tenants in the same area and in similar circumstances, for example, receive the same amount of housing benefit based on a set amount, rather than the amount of rent paid. Crucially, the tenant in receipt of the reformed local housing allowance is also provided with some personal responsibility. It should be made clear that the payment that enables a person to live in a property is not plucked out of fresh air, but comes with a degree of financial control and responsibility. That should help the person, where applicable, to make the transition away from benefits altogether and into employment, which is good for the individual and good for the community.

I am gladdened by the findings in the DWP evaluation, which show that most pathfinder claimants have a bank account or have been able to open one. Overall, six in 10 claimants who are paid housing benefit directly under the local housing allowance are paid via an automatic system of some sort. The pathfinder evaluation also demonstrates impressive financial control from tenants: across all pathfinder schemes, nine out of 10 remained up to date with their rent for about 10 months.

Nevertheless, I wonder whether the evaluation findings contradict all other known evidence regarding financial inclusion. As my hon. and learned Friend pointed out, being out of work and on benefits enormously increases the risk of financial exclusion. Some 25 per cent. of those people—at the poorest end of society—have no access to a current account. I was a member of the Consumer Credit Bill Standing Committee, and I am aware that the poorest in society are, for example, excluded from discounts for direct debit payments because they have no bank account, while affordable short-term credit is replaced by money sharks offering interest rates of 100 or even 1,000 per cent.

Being financially excluded can cost, and the most deprived pay the price. That is why there is a genuine need for substantial financial education for those tenants participating in the pathfinder scheme to ensure that the risk of financial exclusion and deprivation is minimised. In general, I welcome the pathfinder scheme. It is fair, it simplifies the system, and it promotes responsibility on the part of the landlord and the tenant. Despite the teething troubles that my hon. and learned Friend so eloquently pointed out, I am keen for the scheme to be implemented in Hartlepool as soon as possible.

10.10 am

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) on securing this debate on such an important subject. This is a good time to have this debate, given that at one stage we had expected the Government by now to have published in the form of a Bill proposals for the roll-out of housing benefit reform. Perhaps it is as well that that has been delayed, as it gives a chance for greater reflection on the results from the pathfinder areas and on the issues that Members have raised. However, I would like the Minister to give us some idea as to when the Government might expect to introduce proposals for reform of housing benefit to be rolled out on a national basis. Can we expect a Bill in the near future? I also hope that the Minister will assure the House that the views expressed in the debate will be taken into account in the drafting of any future Bill.

As Members have said, the proposal to roll out the local housing allowance is based on a number of perceived problems with the current system of housing benefit. The LHA is intended to tackle lack of fairness and choice, complexity, disincentives to work and the issue of encouraging claimants to take more personal responsibility—as the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) mentioned. They are aims that are worth considering in more detail.

The first of them is fairness and choice. The Department for Work and Pensions suggests that paying different amounts to different people in the same area is unfair. The LHA allows choice in terms of both the quality and the price of accommodation. However, a Shelter report found that one of the major barriers to claimants finding good, affordable accommodation is the shortage of suitable housing overall—that is certainly the experience in my constituency. In areas with a large and liquid housing market where there is plenty of supply and choice, the shopping around benefit might prove to be significant.

A couple of months ago, I visited the pathfinder pilot area in Lewisham to talk to the people who had been involved in rolling that out there, in order to find out how well it had worked. In Lewisham, there seemed to be some evidence that the shopping around benefit was being maintained. However, I am concerned that in rural areas and small communities that benefit might prove to be more of an illusion than a reality. Therefore, greater scrutiny of results, especially from the Argyll and Bute pathfinder area, would be useful. The LHA might be fair and allow greater choice in principle, but that will not happen in many areas without a greater supply of good, affordable housing.

Another fairness issue is the single room rent for young people. Shelter has reported that the SRR is a factor in homelessness among young people. I concur with that. The Minister recently answered a parliamentary question on the matter. On the most recent figures, approximately 12,000 people receive the SRR, so the costs of providing the full housing benefit—or the LHA, in the future—to claimants of all ages would not be too great, and that would enable younger people in particular to be dealt with fairly. I would be interested to hear the Minister's reflections on that point.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): The hon. Gentleman mentioned Shelter with regard to this restriction. He will also know that the CAB has said that it is regrettable that the research evaluating the impact of the LHA to date has not said anything about the impact on under-25s. It would be useful if the Department published research on that. Does he agree with that view, which is evidently a sensible one?

Danny Alexander: I agree with that point. Publication of more research on the impact of the single room rent on under-25s and how it has worked in the pathfinder areas would be useful. It is an important part of the debate and one that the Bill on reforming housing benefit should take forward, to provide greater fairness for under-25s.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar also referred to deposit schemes—schemes to support people making deposits. Raising a deposit can be a major barrier to people moving into rented accommodation. I suppose that part of the idea behind the LHA is that the landlord need not necessarily know that someone is on housing benefit, but if they are not able to raise a deposit, that is clearly impossible. Supporting or encouraging rent deposit schemes is a sensible way forward, and I was pleased to hear the hon. and learned Lady's comments about the ODPM encouraging such schemes. I would be grateful if the Minister would reinforce or amplify that point.

On complexity, it seems that the LHA can speed up the processing time for private tenant claims. However, it is also the case—this seemed to be confirmed by the evidence that we heard in Lewisham—that the time taken to make checks on vulnerability can, for those people who seem to have the status of being vulnerable or who suggest that they are vulnerable, counteract the savings in assessment time.

The DWP evaluation found no significant improvement on error and fraud as a result of the change to the LHA. Rent-based fraud seems the most likely to be tackled, but claimants keep the difference between the LHA and their rent if there is any. Savings, in that sense, are unlikely. We welcome the announcement in this week's pre-Budget report that more funding will be provided to reduce housing benefit fraud by reviewing or visiting at least 50 per cent. of claimants each year. Will the Minister tell us what the overall funds are? When will benefit authorities find out how much they are likely to get in future years so that they can start planning how to undertake this work?

A further question concerns how difficult it is for claimants to understand what they will receive. The LHA should make that simpler, although there is still a degree of complexity to do with the number of rooms, which particular broad market area someone lives in and so on. I welcome reports from the pathfinder authorities suggesting that claimants find understanding their likely entitlement much easier.

The question of the incentives to work or otherwise is an important one. It crosses the whole gamut of welfare and benefit reform that the Government are proposing. Removing disincentives to work and increasing incentives to work through the benefits system is an important and worthwhile objective. The DWP website suggests:

> "Greater certainty about what in-work benefit they could receive is expected to help tenants bridge the gap between being out of work and taking a job."

So far, there is little evidence in support of the DWP's claim in the evaluation from the pathfinder areas.

One of the major disincentives in the housing benefit and council tax benefit system is the tapers: there is a 65 per cent. taper for housing benefit and a 20 per cent. taper for council tax benefit, leading to an overall benefit withdrawal rate of 85 per cent. In my experience, from people coming to my surgeries, the rate at which those benefits are withdrawn acts as a significant disincentive to work. Will the Minister be addressing that issue in any proposals to be introduced?

Encouraging people to take more personal responsibility for their own finances and for paying their own rent is a laudable objective. Clearly, as has been said, the ending of direct payments to landlords in the vast majority of cases, except where vulnerability is an issue, is perhaps the most controversial part of the reforms. It is opposed by several organisations. In Lewisham, there has been a 20 per cent. increase in the amount of unrecovered overpayments due to direct payments to landlords. Although increasing responsibility and financial management skills is an excellent aim, which we support, it is still unclear whether the pros outweigh the cons in this scheme.

Some pathfinder boroughs are accepting any vulnerability requests without making checks, as a way of speeding up the processing of vulnerability claims. That may well be the best approach for authorities to adopt in practice, but I would be grateful if the Minister could describe the rules for the best way of dealing with vulnerability claims in practice.

I want to raise one or two other issues, first with regard to the broad rental market areas. There are concerns in some areas that it is still a blunt tool, and that more account must be taken of local variations. So far in the pathfinder areas, we have not seen any sudden increase in rents to match local housing allowance levels, which was one of the fears. However, there is evidence that some stakeholders see signs of it happening through a creeping effect. Given that the LHA is based on market rents, the effect could be to push rents and the LHA higher over time. I hope that that will be carefully monitored. The Minister may want to say something about it.

As the hon. and learned Member for Redcar said, a number of private landlords were reported in the Department's evaluation as saying that they should take on fewer housing benefit claimants, believing that payments to tenants under the LHA would lead to rent arrears. It is worth noting that that is the landlords' perception; there is not a great deal of evidence to support it. However, following a national roll-out of the LHA, what action does the Minister propose to take to prevent that response from landlords?

[Danny Alexander]

There is an issue about the high level of failure by local authorities to make interim payments within 14 days. That failure is unfair on claimants, and it can lead to debt and homelessness. The Government must ensure that there is sufficient sanction in place for those authorities that fail to make interim payments, so that people are not left for a long period—perhaps while a vulnerability claim is being assessed—without any payment whatever.

The question of the funding of the roll-out of the LHA has also been raised. Shelter suggested that the £180 million allocated by the Treasury for national roll-out is not enough. Will the Minister confirm that that figure is correct? Will he also describe how that funding will compare with that received by the pathfinder authorities, once it is shared throughout the country? Was the figure derived from the DWP's evaluation of costs required by pathfinder authorities, or was it just what could be squeezed out of the Treasury?

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) made the point about the conflicting priorities of the Treasury and the Department. If the roll-out happens nationally, it will be important to ensure that funding is made available to deal with some of the problems that have arisen, and not least to continue the funding for advice services. They have been running with citizens advice bureaux and so on in pathfinder areas, and in Lewisham and in other areas they have been valuable.

Will the Minister confirm that although there are no firm plans to roll-out the LHA to the social rented sector throughout the country, consideration is being given to a pilot? Will he confirm that there will be no roll-out to the social rented sector throughout the country without further primary legislation or a debate and a vote in the House of Commons? That is clearly a matter of concern to housing associations and other landlords in the social rented sector.

Sir George Young: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but what would be the point in piloting the scheme unless there was a plan to roll it out?

Danny Alexander: The purpose of a pilot is to evaluate a proposal to see whether it works. My point is not that the scheme should not be rolled out, but that there should be no automatic provision for its roll-out without a further debate and vote in the House of Commons. Only in that way can those authorities and the many thousands of tenants in the social rented sector be assured that the scheme will not be rolled out for cost-cutting purposes—for reasons to do with the Treasury, which the right hon. Gentleman described—when the pilot showed that in that sector the scheme was not sufficiently beneficial, given the greater level of vulnerability that is often found among tenants in the social rented sector.

In conclusion, it is clear that the system of housing benefit needs reform, but the assessment of the pathfinder areas shows some pros and cons. It must be clear how a housing benefit reform Bill will improve on the pathfinder pilots so that a national roll-out is worth the cost and disruption that will be caused to local authorities. I hope that it will also address problems such as the single room rent, which I have referred to, the work disincentives in the current housing benefit system and the failure to issue interim payments. I look forward to the Minister's response.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): Mr. Gale, it is a pleasure to see you in the Chair. The House owes a debt to the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) for introducing this timely debate on the pathfinders. She said at the start that she was not an expert and my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) said that he was not either, but, in a positive way, they both touched on many key points that I want to return to. The hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) made a point that we will all sympathise with about antisocial tenants. Given that the pathfinder scheme has not been extended to the social sector so far, I am not clear exactly what the pathfinders do or have done to address that problem. Perhaps the Minister could be helpful and tell us the Department's thinking on the Prime Minister's scheme to, as I understand it, withdraw housing benefit from antisocial tenants, which we heard a great deal about in the previous Parliament.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar began by drawing attention to a kind of irony in that Middlesbrough is best known for being on the doorstep of Redcar and she was on the doorstep of a pathfinder that collapsed. I think that she said that for all she knew there may be others. As far as I know, Middlesbrough is the only pilot that collapsed.

Vera Baird: It did not collapse. Middlesbrough council decided that it did not want to have a pathfinder because of the knock-on damaging effect that it might have on rented accommodation in Redcar next door, where people did not have as much money in their pockets.

Mr. Goodman: It sounds pretty much like a collapse to me, and the reason for it is the one that the hon. and learned Lady gave. There were worries that tenants would come in from outside to take advantage of the relatively favourable terms of the scheme. That alerts us to a point that was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire, which is that, in all areas of legislation, as many of us know from other areas, there is such a thing as the law of unintended consequences. The pathfinders must be examined extremely carefully because—I do not say this in an unhelpful spirit—they may bring about unexpected consequences.

It seems reasonable in practice to try to simplify the system by paying a standard allowance that will allow tenants to shop around in search of rents. That is certainly the view that we expressed when the pilots were first announced. As the Minister knows, Beveridge called a chapter of his report "The Problem of Rent" and debated whether rents should be subsidised individually or whether there should be standard allowances. In fact, he came down in favour of standard allowances, so the Government are trying to get back to the original spirit of Beveridge. However, theory is only theory. What really matters is the practice and that is where the evidence from the pathfinders is a bit ambiguous.

The Minister will have read the Citizens Advice report, "Early days: CAB evidence on the Local Housing Allowance", which the hon. and learned Member for Redcar and others alluded to. Citizens Advice states that the "report raises a number of concerns which must be addressed before the reforms are rolled out nationally".

Shelter is concerned about aspects of the new scheme and the National Landlords Association has specific reservations. Many of those reservations have been aired this morning, but perhaps only one is overwhelming. It falls into two interlocking parts.

First, if the scheme were rolled out nationally, some vulnerable tenants would spend some of the money that is paid up front, as the hon. and learned Member for Redcar said. Landlords would not get their money, legal action and homelessness would follow, and landlords would withdraw property from the market.

Secondly, that outcome could be avoided if the Government were to replicate the apparently favourable terms of the local housing allowances: generous standard rates and the provision of, for example, money advice services, which have been a feature of local housing allowances. The problem for the Department and the Minister is that might be too expensive for the Treasury to bear. That is the dilemma with which the Minister is wrestling.

The Citizens Advice report states:

"We question whether the procedure is sufficiently robust to cope with a national roll out", and a previous Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), was sceptical about the practicality of rolling out the pathfinders for broadly those reasons.

We were promised in the Queen's Speech in May

"legislation to reform support for housing costs."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 May 2005; Vol. 672, c. 5.]

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) referred to that. On 18 May, the Bill was described in no less a source than The Guardian as "an early priority". So where is the Bill?

We need to step back for a moment and look at what is in the Department's in-tray. There is the debate about the Turner report. Clearly, there is disagreement between Turner and the Department, and the Treasury. There is the debate about incapacity benefit. The Prime Minister's office put forward eyebrow-raising proposals about vouchers, which, apparently, are being resisted by the Department. There is the debate about the Child Support Agency, which the Prime Minister has said is unsustainable in its present form. The Department has a lot in its in-tray.

How big a priority for the Department is rolling out pathfinders, and to what degree does it think that such a roll-out is practicable? I hope that the Minister can give some guidance about that. Do the Government plan to introduce a Bill shortly after the Christmas recess, or have they concluded that more evidence from the pathfinders is necessary? One point that it would be helpful for the Minister to clear up is whether any research will be done on the second wave of pathfinders, or whether results from the first wave will continue to be evaluated.

The Department's initial research on the impact of the LHA in the pathfinder authorities was overwhelmingly positive, but Shelter's monitoring of the impact suggests that the evidence is more mixed. Does the Minister agree with that assessment? Can he guarantee, if the scheme is rolled out nationally, that tenants who receive standard allowances will receive the same assistance that has been available in pathfinder areas, such as the advice services that were referred to earlier? What implications does that have for cost? When will the promised consultation on applying the pathfinder model to social housing be published? There have been reports that it will be issued at the same time as the Bill. Can the Minister give us some guidance on that and rule out the possibility that the Bill will apply to social housing as well as to the private rented sector? Clearly, that would clearly be premature.

The overall challenge posed by housing benefit is daunting. In the last Work and Pensions Question Time, it was pointed out by the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), who was here earlier, that "housing benefit regulations consist of 967 pages, five parts, six schedules and 40 statutory instruments."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 28 November 2005; Vol. 440, c. 12.]

The right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside described housing benefit as "a nightmare". The cost of administering appeals has risen in each of the past three years, as I found out recently from a written answer, and is now more than £2.3 billion. The number of appeals has risen in each year since the appeals service assumed responsibility in 2001.

The Department has a target to reduce fraud and error from its 2002–03 levels by 25 per cent. by March 2006. When I asked the Minister during a recent debate on fraud and error whether he was confident that the Government would hit that target, he was unable to confirm that they would. Perhaps he will say something about that today.

Choice is one of the key words of this debate. The Government argue correctly that the pathfinders extend choice, because paying the allowance at a certain rate enables recipients of housing benefit to shop around. Clearly, that is what is meant by "choice". However, as the hon. and learned Member for Redcar and my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire said, the pathfinders do not give choice in one crucial respect, which is that the tenant does not have the choice to receive housing benefit direct or have it paid to the landlord. As other hon. Members have said, if the Government want to build on the choice principle, they could go in that direction, particularly since passing the vulnerability test, to which the hon. and learned Member for Redcar referred, is rather complex.

The Government want to simplify the system, which they are doing by looking to pay the flat rate, but they are building in other complexities by making special arrangements to assess vulnerability. As the hon. and learned Lady said, many tenants will not want to approach the authorities and say, "Hey! I'm vulnerable. I can't manage my own finances."

[Mr. Goodman]

Perhaps the Minister will say whether it is possible that, rather than introducing a Bill, he will want to see a further roll-out of pathfinders.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt) indicated dissent.

Mr. Goodman: The Minister is shaking his head, so I do not think that that is so. We will see in a moment.

Be that as it may, it would be helpful if the Minister gave some indication of how the Government view the way forward. If he thinks that more research is needed before a Bill is introduced, it would be helpful for him to say so. If he thinks that a national roll-out would be too great a financial obstacle for the Treasury to bear, he might want to say something about that. We would be grateful if he gave some indication about the progress of the Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): This has been a good and informed debate, prompted by the excellent contribution by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), who does not describe herself as an expert but who sounded perilously close to being one. The subsequent contributions were also of a high calibre and rightly so, because this is an important subject.

It might be helpful if I clarified where we are with the proposal, because almost everyone who has spoken has touched on that. Pathfinders have been running for a couple of years in some cases, although some were initiated much more recently, and we are regularly evaluating their experiences. To date, my Department has published seven documents covering different aspects of that evaluation. We are doing this with a high degree of transparency. A lot of people are closely following the policy as it evolves.

We have said many times that the evaluation of the pathfinders' experience will continue into next year, so we will be issuing further information as we go forward, learning from their experience. We also made it clear in the Queen's Speech that during this Session we would introduce legislation to deal with the reform of housing benefit. The context of where we are should be pretty clear.

As well as doing our own independent evaluation of the pathfinders, we are listening carefully to the representations coming to us from all other interested bodies and organisations. I pay careful attention to publications issued by Shelter and the citizens advice bureaux. We are listening carefully to the landlords organisations, too. As well as my listening to those representations and taking on board what is being said, the pathfinders are receiving information from the organisations in their localities. Extensive information and assessments are coming to us and it is important that we consider everything that we learn. Before moving to a national scheme, we must be sure that we have made the most of the pathfinders.

I say on behalf of the Department that I am extremely grateful to the authorities that agreed to do the pathfinder work for us. It is invaluable. I meet them regularly and visit the areas in which they operate. They are doing a high-quality job and it is proving informative for us as Ministers as we move towards setting up a scheme for wider implementation.

Many points have been made in the debate. I shall respond to some specific issues that have been raised, after which I shall deal with a few others more substantively because they were common to all contributions. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar was right to emphasise the problems with housing benefit. None of us would start from here if we wanted to come up with a scheme to support people in meeting their housing costs. The system is incredibly complicated and we must move towards simplification.

My hon. and learned Friend asked whether there was a risk of a flight of landlords. The evidence from the pathfinders showed that that was not the case. Many landlords organisations were concerned about such matters at the outset and we have monitored the position carefully as the pathfinders have been rolled out. I wish to share with her the views that have been expressed recently by Blackpool, a pathfinder authority, about potential landlord flight to which she and other hon. Members have referred. A few weeks ago, its newsletter stated:

> "After the initial procedural changes at the point of going live with the LHA, we are content that our current practices are working well, and we even received praise by a number of landlords at a recent landlord training event. This is a massive turnaround as these same landlords were very sceptical about LHA when we first started talking to them in the summer of 2003. We have proved, that if you listen to landlord concerns and put procedures in place to reassure them then landlord confidence can be maintained."

That is an encouraging response. It has been echoed by other pathfinder authorities.

My hon. and learned Friend then referred to worries about the element of the local housing allowance that concentrates on paying the benefit direct to the tenants, not the landlords. She encouraged us to return to the position that pertains whereby housing benefit is paid directly to the landlord. We want to get away from that because we are encouraging personal responsibility. It is part of the welfare reform programme, and another aspect of the reform that I have been monitoring carefully is its impact on those who had their housing benefit paid directly to their landlord, but who now, having switched to an LHA, receive it themselves. They are now responsible for ensuring that the rent is paid.

We hoped that the system would have a beneficial impact, and evidence has shown that it has. We have published some research that merits careful examination. We asked people who were not in work, but whose housing benefit was being paid direct to the landlord, about their expectation of an eventual return to work. We found a low level of anticipation that they would return to work within the next year or so. We took a similar group with a similar period of unemployment who lived in an area where we were piloting the LHA. They were receiving that allowance and had taken on the responsibility for managing their own finances and for making sure that their rent was paid. We asked them the same question: what was their expectation of seeking a return to work in the near future? A very substantially higher number said that they were seeking such a return.

If there is to be this welfare effect of the reform, we must welcome it. It has been suggested that we should switch back to a situation in which the tenants' relationship is entirely passive, and where they are not involved in handling the money or in taking responsibility for the payment of the rent. If we were to return to that situation, we might pay a price in terms of their not making the move of coming out of welfare and thinking of returning to the world of work. That is an important aspect of the reform, and I do not want us to lose it. I am trying to reassure my hon. and learned Friend that the early indications are that the impact of the reform is beneficial.

Vera Baird: I was not suggesting that that element should be forgone. I see it as a very real benefit. Additionally, there is the impact on the kind of community in South Bank which I talked about. If an individual has chosen to live there and is paying their own rent, they are far more likely to be engaged in the community than if the rent is simply paid anonymously from the authority to the landlord. Therefore, I can see many benefits in having that responsibility imposed on people. However, I wonder whether there is scope for widening the criteria for having the payment made direct to the landlord, in order to get away from the awkward situation of vulnerability having to be proved, which seems to me to be a difficult thing to do. I also wonder whether it might be possible to widen the element of choice—to give more responsibility, rather than to take it away. Opposition Members spoke about that.

Mr. Plaskitt: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for those comments, because I see that she is tying this matter to the issue of vulnerability, and to the current provision whereby we can switch back to making the payment direct to the landlord in instances of vulnerability. Let me reassure her and other Members who spoke on the matter that we are looking at this aspect very carefully in the evaluations, and I am receiving reports from the pathfinder areas specifically on how the vulnerability test is working. We are learning about that matter from our experience in the pathfinder areas. I will try to deal with the other points that my hon. and learned Friend raised more substantively, because other Members also raised them.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) took us on a trip back down memory lane to the great poll tax disaster. That is not easily forgotten. He also asked if my Department was in sync with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. It is of course true that responsibility for housing issues crosses the two Departments—that is certainly the case when the element of supporting the cost of housing is included. Some housing responsibilities lie with the ODPM and others lie with my Department. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that the two Departments are working closely together.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) raised the issue of tackling antisocial behaviour, and our two Departments work jointly on that all the time. Other points raised were to do with choice, which I have already touched on, and with the single room rent, which I want to deal with more substantively in a moment.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander)—it would be helpful if we could think of a shorter version of that constituency name—raised a series of points, some of which I want to pick up on in detail because other Members also raised them. He asked in particular about tackling fraud in respect of housing benefit, as he has done before. He asked about funding for local authorities to help with that, and he will be pleased to hear that, in consultation with local authority representatives, we have agreed changes to the way that money is allocated for anti-fraud activities. Local authorities will now get an all-in sum for administration and fraud that is notified up front each year. This week, we issued a circular on that which I hope he and local authorities will find helpful. The hon. Gentleman said that he thought there was no evidence of an impact on work-readiness from the pilot authorities. As I have just said in response to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar, we have some encouraging evidence that there is a positive impact and are certainly looking carefully at that aspect of reform.

The hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) rightly asked about the advice services at the time of roll-out. We have put some funding into the pathfinder experience to support financial advice services. I have been looking carefully at how that has been working, and it has been very effective. We have taken on board the point that there needs to be some element of continuing support for financial advice, both for vulnerable tenants and perhaps for others at the time of national roll-out. It tends to be an initial need and does, of course, tail off. The more progress we make in broadening financial inclusion, the less need there is for such support. What we have seen in the pathfinder areas was a quick, high-level demand for that support, but it very quickly tailed off. Once those who needed support to get through the transition had done it, the issue was largely dealt with. So it is an important point, but one which we have taken on board.

In the remaining time, I want to deal with some points that were common to all contributions. I return first to the views expressed by Shelter. I continue to be grateful for its close interest in the matter; Shelter's submissions are indeed helpful to us. Overall, the feedback from Shelter on the LHA has been quite positive, supporting the objectives of the new scheme. In its interim research report "On the right path?", which has been referred to in our debate, Shelter concludes that > "many of the concerns expressed when the HB Pathfinders were set up have not materialised. The evidence reveals that removing the choice of direct payments to landlords has not led to an increase in homelessness ... Likewise, the reforms have not, so far, lead to a widespread increase in rents".

Shelter thus has reasons to be broadly supportive of the reform.

While visiting Brighton recently to talk to Shelter about its experiences there, I was struck by the fact that one officer told me that if she was drawing up a wish-list of things that the Government should do to reduce homelessness, she would have put the LHA at the top of the list. We need to consider the effects, and Shelter rightly keeps testing us there. I can certainly assure hon. Members that, on this issue, we want to be confident of being right at the time of national roll-out.

[Mr. Plaskitt]

We also take seriously the response from the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux; it too has recently published reports on the LHA, which I have studied. I am heartened that NACAB is also generally supportive of the LHA and reporting that implementation is going relatively smoothly. I note the concerns that it has raised: difficulties for some tenants in accessing bank accounts, some concerns over direct payments and, again, the need for continued money advice. However, the evaluation is interesting in putting into context the issues around access to bank accounts. It showed that 95 per cent. of tenants now have a bank account—with a quarter of those tenants having opened their account specifically to receive the LHA—while there are no significant reports of tenants complaining about encashment charges.

I now return to the issue of private landlord reaction, which I have already touched on briefly. First, I should make it clear that landlords have generally been supportive of the concept of local housing allowance. What they have objected to is the removal of automatic direct payment to landlords, which saves them having to collect the rent and reduces any risk of non-payment. Again, the findings coming out of the pathfinders are quite encouraging there. Secondly, the experience is that landlords have raised concerns and continue to do so. However, resistance has reduced markedly in the pathfinder areas now that the scheme is running smoothly. As I have said, many of the concerns raised now come from those not yet involved in the LHA. I assure hon. Members that we continue to listen carefully to the views expressed by landlords.

A couple of hon. Members raised the issue of the single room rent. I recognise that its abolition is a top priority for many stakeholders and hon. Members present. However, there is a fundamental principle of fairness and equity to uphold. Young single people under 25 have earnings prospects well below those of older people, and 60 per cent. of those who rent in the private-sector who are not in receipt of housing benefit rent shared accommodation. It is not unreasonable to expect young people in receipt of housing benefit to share accommodation.

I am aware that in some areas young people may have difficulty accessing shared housing, and that for them choice is limited. Extra help is available in the form of discretionary housing payments and flexible support from local authorities on a case-by-case basis. In LHA areas we have implemented a more generous shared room rate that more accurately reflects the accommodation available in the area. As we move forward with housing benefit reform we will continue to review the single room rent, to ensure that young people can access appropriate accommodation.

A number of colleagues asked about rolling out the reform into the social sector. I appreciate that conditions in the social housing sector are very different from those in the private sector. We understand that. For example, we cannot pretend that social sector tenants always have the same degree of choice as those in the private sector, because they clearly do not. Differences such as those will need to be taken seriously in developing any proposals for reform.

We should not shy away from reform in that sector just because it will be difficult and because the sector is so different. We need to address issues such as choice and fairness and we need to ensure that housing benefit keeps pace with our wider welfare reform agenda—for example, by ensuring that it supports our 80 per cent. employment target and does not act as a barrier to people returning to work. We are going to do this in discussion with the experts on social housing, which is why we will continue to proceed cautiously in developing this reform in respect of the social rented sector.

Everyone who has contributed to the debate appreciates the immense complexity of the world of housing benefit. Local authorities who administer it also find it complex. While we are working on a more substantive and quite radical reform, certainly in respect of private sector accommodation, our eye is not off what we need to do in the meantime to improve the administration of housing benefit.

The Department is engaged closely with local authorities, trying to assist them in improving the processing of the benefit. We are supporting them with additional financial assistance; in fact, we have allocated £180 million to support that. The vast majority of local authorities have taken up some of that support. Overall, the processing times on housing benefit are coming down.

As my hon. and learned Friend and others have said; the performance is patchy. The average performance is markedly better; a couple of weeks have been taken off the average processing time for housing benefit. The Department asks authorities to achieve 34 or 35-day processing. The majority of local authorities have reached that. The laggards have caught up to some extent, but there are still many whose processing times are unacceptably long. I assure all hon. Members that we continue to concentrate heavily on that issue. It is not acceptable that processing times should be of that length; it creates problems for people trying to secure rented accommodation and support for it. We concentrate on that area at the same time as we are concluding our thoughts on the future roll-out of a reform to housing benefit in the private rented sector.

Rural Pubs

11 am

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): Rural areas face problems with employment, housing, transport and health, but sustaining their communities can present them with particular challenges. Although my constituency is largely urban, it does have rural areas that suffer from all those problems, and I have constituents who want to see further progress made in tackling them.

This Government have done more than any previous Government to invest in sustainable rural development with a range of measures, including help for rural transport, rural post offices and rate relief. I secured this debate to ask the Government to continue that important work with further support for the institution that so often represents the beating heart of rural communities—the rural pub.

As the supermarkets tighten their grip on our shopping habits and as patterns of work and settlement keep changing, increasingly the village pub provides the main, and sometimes the only, focus for social activity in rural areas. Without such a focal point, the sense of community evaporates from rural areas, and that sense of community is essential for regeneration. Yet the rural pub is under threat. Some estimates suggest that six are closing every week. There are many reasons for that: drink driving regulations inhibit many people from driving out into the country for an evening at the pub as they might have done 30 or 40 years ago; the extremely competitive prices charged by supermarkets for beer are encouraging some to drink at home instead of going out to the pub; and the changing composition of villages means that more and more people are commuting in and out of them. All those things challenge the viability of many rural pubs.

Those problems are well known and a lot of good work has gone on to tackle them. The Campaign for Real Ale, for example, has been indefatigable in championing the cause of choice, and small breweries, to make all pubs more attractive to the discerning and committed consumer.

There are good examples of what can be achieved. Some pubs have been making themselves sustainable by diversifying into other areas, including prescription deliveries, DVD rentals, and even delicatessen and broadband facilities. There have been inspiring examples of villagers giving their pub a new sustainable financial basis by buying it as a co-operative.

When, as the Minister with responsibility for small business six years ago, I set up the Small Business Service, I wrote into its remit that it should encourage mutual enterprise as an instrument of regeneration. I believed then, and still do, that such co-operation and mutuality can be an invaluable instrument of community regeneration. It is encouraging to see rural communities putting that into practice by supporting their local pubs in that way, but more needs to be done. I hope that the Minister can reassure me that his officials and those in the Department for Trade and Industry will work with the Small Business Service to ensure everything possible is being done to provide support for villages that might want to form co-operatives to run their local pub.

The Minister will be aware of the role of the Pub is the Hub initiative, originated by Business in the Community, in spreading best practice. Again, I would welcome his reassurance that he and his officials, and those in the DTI, will work with Pub is the Hub to ensure that it receives the funding and other support to enable it to develop its work so all rural pubs can benefit from it. I should be grateful if the Minister could write to me by the end of March about the action that is under way in those areas, so I can reassure my constituents about the good work being done by the Government.

I would welcome reassurance from the Minister about how the fairness, equitability and sustainability of the commercial environment in which rural pubs operate can be ensured. He will know that in recent years ownership of pubs has become increasingly concentrated. The top six so-called pubcos control almost 40 per cent. of UK pubs. He will also know that a year ago the Select Committee on Trade and Industry conducted a thorough investigation of their relationships with their tenants. I do not intend to rehearse all those arguments today, but I have some concerns that I shall raise with the Minister. Before I do so, however, I stress that I have no quarrel with the Select Committee's balanced conclusions about the trade-off between the so-called dry rent and the wet rent charged by the pubcos—the profit they make from contractually exclusively supplying beer to their tenants.

I recognise that some pubcos have moved some way towards addressing concerns about their relationship with tenants. The largest have codes of conduct that stress that tenants should take professional advice before entering into any contract, and their websites offer clear and helpful accounts of different business models available to potential tenants.

However, there are still grounds for concern. Pubcos start from a strong position, first because there remains a strong demand for tenancies, not necessarily because a tenancy offers a viable living but because many people still dream of the rural idyll of running their own business in a pretty village. There are other attractions. The chief executive of Punch Taverns plc said earlier this year that taking on a lease with accommodation "can appear a very attractive deal when house prices are so expensive".

Such a lease can also seem attractive because the entry costs into the business in that way are lower than taking on a free house.

However, such attractions must not be an excuse for abuse of a dominant position in a contractual relationship, and there is certainly a price to pay for the low cost of entry. For example, I have seen detailed figures prepared by a successful and experienced publican in the Swindon area, who is now a contented tenant of a local brewery, but was previously an unhappy tenant of a pubco. Those figures suggest, among other things, that the percentage of gross profit taken by rent will be less than 10 per cent for a free house but more than 20 per cent. for the lessee of a pubco.

[Mr. Michael Wills]

The Trade and Industry Committee rehearsed the main complaints against alleged exploitation by pubcos a year ago, and some of the questions it raised have still not been properly answered. The Select Committee said that pubcos should insist

"as a condition of acceptance that tenants obtained all necessary professional advice. This should be one element of an industrywide code of practice."

The new code of practice is now out for consultation by the British Beer and Pub Association and goes a long way towards meeting that objective. That is important because Morgan Stanley, for example, found that 40 per cent. of prospective tenants took no legal advice before signing lease agreements, 42 per cent. said they were encouraged by the pubco to do so and 63 per cent. were not asked by the pubco whether they had done so.

Obtaining such advice should ensure that tenants understand better what they are getting into, but that does not guarantee that pubcos will alter objectionable clauses. There are often two or three potential tenants pursuing the same lease, which puts them in a difficult position. It is a seller's market and the pubcos hold most of the cards. Some of the clauses that they put in their contracts are worrying. One, from a contract issued by one of the largest pubcos, states:

"the tenant agrees to pay trading accounts and statements . . . on the dates specified by the Landlord".

That is followed in the same agreement, which ties the tenant to buying beer only from the pubco landlord, by the statement that "the landlord shall on the signing of this lease and from time to time thereafter supply the tenant with a pricelist of beers".

In other words, there is no contractual fetter on the landlords to prevent them from raising prices as often as they want and as high as they want, and demanding payment as frequently as they want. Those clauses are not subject to any test of reasonableness or tied to any increase in the pubcos' charges from the brewery. In this case, the pubco seems able to charge whatever it wants, whenever it wants.

The pubcos frequently claim that their business model depends on their tenants prospering, and the argument is advanced that it would not be in their interest to bleed tenants dry. However, there is a difference between the extreme position of bleeding them dry and simply exploiting them by charging unreasonably high prices for the tied beer, secure in the knowledge that their tenants will often work extremely long hours to make the business pay, and swallow any disproportionate increases in costs.

It is hard to avoid the conclusion that such clauses leave pubcos in a position where they can use their dominant economic position to exploit their tenants. That does not mean that the tenants will necessarily go bankrupt. They may survive by working hours, and at a standard of living, that no pubco director would accept, but survival can be consistent with exploitation and nothing in the new code of practice issued by the British Beer and Pub Association will prevent that, as far as I can see.

The so-called wet rent, which is derived from the profit made on the exclusive supply of beer to tenants, is justified by the claim that it is partly offset against the rent charged for the premises so that such rent is competitive. However, I am also concerned about the so-called dry rent. The Trade and Industry Committee report stated:

"The industry could and should establish clear guidelines for the rent valuation process" with

"new national guidance for rent calculation . . . The profit assessment method of calculating rent should be carried out in accordance with national accounting standards".

However, the British Beer and Pub Association code of practice states that "company codes of practice should, as far as reasonably practicable and possible, provide for the making available to the lessee of information relating to how the rent will be determined initially", which is not quite what the Select Committee recommended. It suggests that the fixing of rent and rent reviews will remain contentious, and, in the absence of the national standards suggested by the Select Committee, that there will still be scope for pubcos to exploit their tenants. Apart from anything else, the more vague and opaque the process, the more disputes over unjustifiably high rents and rent increases can be resolved only through litigation. How many tenants can afford to litigate against huge powerful pubcos?

Apart from the operation of the charges for tied beer and rent, I am also worried about the appropriate disclosure of information to tenants and potential tenants, which, again, was called for by the Select Committee. There are disturbing signs that the pubcos are not fully signed up to that. The Select Committee said that

"pubcos should advise their tenants of the average discount they receive" from brewers, and

"how this compares to the free market discounts available, and how much of this discount pubcos are passing onto their tenants".

Enterprise, which is one of the largest pubcos, said in response that that was "entirely irrelevant to the tenant's decision-making process".

I am baffled by that response. It hardly suggests that pubcos view their tenants as partners. Of course such information helps tenants understand the business model of their competitors and, indeed, the strength or weakness of their position in relation to their landlords. As such, it seems to be highly relevant to tenants' decision-making processes. Of course, contracts with suppliers are subject to commercial confidentiality, but why could tenants not be bound by such clauses? It is not unreasonable to expect partners to share commercially important information.

At best, tenants will not be able to invest in improving their facilities for the community that they serve if they are squeezed too hard. At worst, they will go out of business. That could be a personal disaster for the tenant and could damage the rural community that they serve, but the pubco faces less risk. For them, there will always be the option of liquidating the asset and turning the pub into, for example, housing. That distorted balance of power must be worrying for rural communities that depend on their pub.

I recognise that the worries that I have expressed today may prove groundless. Pubcos may use the latitude in their contracts to behave fairly towards their tenants over the tied supply of beer, rent and other matters. They may consider that it is in their own interests to do so—but there is often no contractual imperative for them to do so.

There are many reasons why it is hard for tenants to fight their contractual corner. The pub can remain a hub of village life only if it is a sustainable business, but sustainability is damaged by unfair exploitative relationships between pubco and tenant. The survival of the rural pub is too important to village life for the Government to abandon this issue. I hope that the Minister agrees that it is important for pubcos to be aware that public scrutiny of their relationship with their tenants will not disappear with their response to the Trade and Industry Committee report a year ago. I would be grateful if he could confirm that his Department and the DTI will continue to monitor the situation, and, if the problems identified by the Select Committee, some of which I touched on today, persist, that they will take any action necessary, including introducing a statutory code of conduct, if appropriate.

11.14 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) on securing this important debate. It reinforces his reputation as an excellent campaigning Member of Parliament who consistently raises issues of concern to his constituents.

The future of pubs is of great public interest, nowhere more so than in rural settings where they not only perform the social function that they do anywhere else, but may be the only place in the community where the village can meet, trade, and, in one or two cases, even vote. I know from more than 10 years of living and working in Wiltshire that that county has a great many fantastic rural pubs. The north of the county, in particular, enjoys the beautiful setting of the landscapes that we associate with the Cotswolds.

Some pubs, such as "The Red Lion" in Castle Eaton in my hon. Friend's constituency, offer the chance to have a relaxed drink in a beer garden on the banks of the Thames. I am sure that the wise voters of Swindon not only enjoy the local pub, but take advantage of some of the wonderful countryside around and about for a walk at the weekend. What better way to round off a nice Sunday walk in the Cotswolds than to enjoy a nice lunch and a pint of Wiltshire's fine Wadworth 6X in a rural pub? I enjoy a similar experience in my constituency on a monthly basis when the Red Ramblers get together and enjoy a good walk, political discussion and a fine pint of Dorset Badger beer at the end.

Rural pubs play a crucial role in promoting local food and tourism. I was lucky enough to visit "The Three Fishes" in the Ribble valley this autumn. The owners not only served excellent food and drink in a quality environment, but positively celebrated the local sourcing of that food. The walls of the pub were decorated with photographs of the local farmers who supply the superb produce. That reconnection of consumers with producers is crucial to the future of rural areas as a whole. The work of "The Three Fishes" demonstrated the best practice in that regard.

For all those reasons, I share my hon. Friend's concerns about the economic viability of pubs. If they are to continue as important community centres, vital parts of the tourism industry and, as he described them, the beating heart of rural communities, they need to continue to be a viable part of the rural economy. Evidence of their state of health is not clear. I heard what he said about the number of closures. On the other hand, an analysis of the interdepartmental business register indicates that there were about 12,000 public houses in rural England in 2003, employing about 50,000 people. The same analysis suggests that the number of pubs in rural England increased by 3 per cent. from 2000 to 2003.

I would add the caution that, although the analysis has not been carried out in sufficient detail to be certain, the growth in rural pubs appears to be largely in those areas with higher numbers of visitors, and we know from the same work that the number of independent pubs has fallen by 8 per cent. I have studied the report from the Trade and Industry Committee that my hon. Friend referred to and I am aware of concerns about the functions of the relationship between a limited number of pubcos and their tenants. There may be a relationship between the fall in the number of independent pubs and the state of the sector in rural areas in general.

We live in a world of seemingly ever-increasing change. The changes affect every corner of life and inevitably have an impact on rural areas. Change can be viewed as a threat or an opportunity. The 2004 rural strategy sets out how the Government will support rural communities through the change. Both elements of the priority on social and economic regeneration are relevant to pubs in rural areas. At one level, rural pubs are simply businesses. They are important to the area of the economy that they serve. They operate in a free market and must respond to market forces, given the strengths and weaknesses that my hon. Friend describes. Government intervention should be a last resort and should deliver clearly defined public benefits.

The Government will support such businesses by ensuring that the business advice is tailored to meet local needs, including rural needs. I pay tribute to the work done in that regard by my hon. Friend when he was small business Minister. Officials from my Department work closely with the Small Business Service and representatives of the social enterprise sector to explore the best ways of meeting the objectives of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. Yesterday, I talked to the Plunkett Foundation about some of these matters. Where appropriate, co-operatives should be encouraged in the running of pubs. I am happy to write to my hon. Friend to reassure him on that and the other points about which he wanted me to correspond with him.

The Government allow councils to reduce business rates by between 50 and 100 per cent. for pubs that are the last retail outlet in the village. The Government's new licensing rules also provide good business opportunities for pubs. Rural pubs know their customers better than anybody else and we are giving them the freedom to offer the services that their customers want in a single licence. They need only the one licence to cover a range of activities and no longer have to make trips to court to renew licences or apply for new ones. They no longer have to apply for a range of separate permissions if they want to open longer for special events, whether it be for St. George's day celebrations or for late-night viewing of sporting events.

[Jim Knight]

As well as being businesses, rural pubs are often the focal point of village life— especially in those villages without a village hall or other centre. The Government want local communities to be empowered to control their own destiny. That includes keeping services that the communities consider important, including pubs as appropriate.

The Government support that social function. Public houses are explicitly recognised in planning policy statement 7 as one of a number of services and facilities with a role in sustaining village communities. Local authorities can refuse to grant permission for a change of use and thus provide an opportunity to keep a pub. The evidence suggests that this power has been successfully used on a number of occasions.

Beyond that basic protection, I am also interested in what more pubs can provide and are providing. Part of the challenge of running a business or providing a public service in rural areas is achieving a viable economy of scale. It is often achieved by diversifying a business and by co-locating services. Co-location can be good for the pub and good for the community.

I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the Pub is the Hub initiative, which my hon. Friend mentioned in his speech. Pub is the Hub is an initiative of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, president of Business in the Community, to encourage pub owners, licensees and local communities to support and maintain local services, and increase the viability of rural pubs. It was set up in 2001.

Pub is the Hub is an independent advisory trust, and it is assisted by the rural action team of BITC, together with the professional pub and drinks industries and other Government and statutory bodies interested in using pub or other rural properties for the support and supply of social enterprise services.

Pub is the Hub is a national body. It is able to co-ordinate activity, advice and industry training that requires pub experience, business aptitude and the raising of necessary funds to support adequately those activities, based upon the current six requests for help each week and more than 400 general inquiries each month via its website. I had a look at the website this morning, and it is very helpful.

Pub is the Hub is not a pub preservation group, but it seeks to encourage social enterprise and diversification where pubs can deliver commercial viability in supporting many rural services that are either under threat or may have recently ceased trading. The main aim is to encourage the co-location of other rural services, sharing overheads and costs, and thereby meeting the service needs of rural communities.

One excellent example of a Pub is the Hub pub is "The Beauchamp Arms" in Dymock in the very north of Gloucestershire, the county adjacent to Wiltshire. In that case, an enterprising parish council had the imagination to grasp an opportunity when the last pub in the village was put up for sale. The council took out a public board loan and purchased the pub, which is adjacent to the village hall. The pub is managed by a management company, and a successful lottery bid, with the excellent help of the Gloucestershire rural community council, has led to the extension of the hall, using the land acquired with the pub.

The community now literally owns the pub. Even during the outbreak of foot and mouth disease in 2001, the village rallied round and used the pub more to keep takings up. The Pub is the Hub website tells me that a number of community groups, such as the playgroup and the parents and teachers association hold meetings there, and there is a monthly lunch for Dymock's over-60s club. The landlord is keen to support other local businesses, and he sources as many of the bar meal ingredients as possible from local suppliers, including the local cheese maker and the butcher and baker from nearby villages.

Dymock is not alone. Already 200 post offices are located in pubs in rural areas; 80 rural shops, convenience stores or bakeries are located in pubs. Fifteen village communities have purchased their own pub, as Dymock has, either as a co-operative or part of a group. A village, Heskett Newmarket, has even bought a brewery.

Pub is the Hub is an excellent initiative. I am keen to work with it on expanding the concept and services like the co-location of post offices. A few months ago, one of my most senior officials spoke at its launch and has joined its national steering board. Its first meeting was on Monday of this week. I hope that that is a demonstration of DEFRA's support.

I come now to the worries of the Select Committee to which my hon. Friend referred. We will continue to monitor the relationship between pubcos and tenants. I will make sure that my colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry are aware of my hon. Friend's comments. The issue affects pubs everywhere, not only in rural areas. Over the past few years, I have worked with the British Beer and Pub Association and have found it to be an effective and professional organisation. My hon. Friend said that it has agreed to develop a code of practice and that that will be published soon.

I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that if we can urge the industry to resolve matters on a voluntary basis, that is better than the Government imposing a solution. I am equally sure that he, the Select Committee and the DTI will monitor events closely, as will I. I wanted to make that clear because the issue is important. I shall, in particular, be examining the problems of exploitation to which my hon. Friend referred in the working hours of publicans and the transparency of rents—the whole arrangement.

The debate has been worth while. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for introducing it. It has given me a welcome opportunity to respond on something for which I am responsible. Usually in this Chamber, I am responding on behalf of my noble Friend, Lord Bach, on issues for which he responsible. I shall write to my hon. Friend about the issues about which he was particularly concerned during the time frame that he described. I am most grateful to have had the opportunity to focus on such a crucial bedrock of rural communities—the local pub. The Government are committed to working with the industry to ensure that the sector remains healthy and that the opportunities to embed local pubs in the community through social enterprise can be grasped.

Flood Prevention (River Severn)

2.30 pm

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): I should like to begin by apologising for my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson). He particularly wanted to be present, but he is involved in a fisheries debate in the main Chamber.

I am pleased to have secured this debate. It has created a great deal of interest in my Shrewsbury constituency. Flooding is a serious issue; it has affected our town for many years. I have not come here to criticise the Government at all. There is a new spirit, and I want to follow my new leader's policy of co-operation with the Government when co-operation is required and appropriate. I wish to use the debate merely to inform the Minister of certain things that are happening in Shrewsbury, and to urge him to act on certain proposals in Shropshire.

Shrewsbury was flooded terribly in 2000, and the Prime Minister duly came to the town, along with the Deputy Prime Minister. They went around in their wellington boots to see what the problems were. There was a great deal of media coverage; the press and TV were there. The Prime Minister promised that he would help Shrewsbury in respect of flooding. That was on the front page of all the newspapers: "Prime Minister promises to help Shrewsbury to prevent flooding in the future."

I must say that some progress has been made, but in Shrewsbury all that there has been is a small flood defence in a place called Frankwell, which protects the council offices and 80 homes. The people who work in the council offices are fine, and the people who live in the 80 homes near the council offices are protected. However, large parts of Shrewsbury continue to flood, such as the areas by the English bridge. I met residents there in 2003: young couples with buckets in their hands trying to save their homes from flooding. They were in great distress. Our football stadium on the Gay Meadow is also prone to flooding. That disrupts numerous football matches. I have no doubt that we would be higher in the league if our football stadium did not flood so frequently; that is another reason why I want better flood prevention in Shrewsbury.

During floods, many businesses close down for long periods. As well as the problems that that causes, the flooding issue leads to investors having long-term concerns about Shrewsbury. They know that the town floods, and a major company that wants to build a facility somewhere will think twice about building it in a town that is prone to flooding.

Another area of concern is affordable housing. As the Minister knows, there is tremendous pressure on local authorities to build affordable housing. However, Shrewsbury is running out of appropriate space, so the council and developers are being tempted to build on flood plains—on areas around Shrewsbury that repeatedly flood. The costs involved in that are astronomical. The purchasers of the homes will have to bear the brunt; extra measures will have to be taken to protect the homes in that area.

I want to mention a couple of individual cases. There is a company in Shrewsbury called Chase Tyres and Exhausts. It is a garage, and it repeatedly floods. The owner said to me, "Every time we flood, we don't get any compensation from the Government; although I have to close my business down, there is no financial help." The Government go out of their way to help other businesses in times of crisis. When the Rover plant tragically had to close, the Government responded quickly with financial assistance. I should like to hear the Minister's views on what further help can be given to businesses facing the crisis of flooding and shutting down for long periods.

A lot of agricultural land is flooded, but farmers do not get the publicity that major businesses receive, and although their land is flooded and they lose business, which has a devastating impact on their production, little is mentioned about them. I should like to hear the Minister say what help can be given to farmers when their land is flooded.

One of my constituents in the village of Pentre loves their home so much that they spent £80,000 of their own money building a dyke all the way round their property. Again, there was no financial assistance for that from the Government.

Flooding is a tremendous misery. Two weeks ago, I visited Underdale road in Shrewsbury, an area that floods repeatedly, and the residents took me in to see their homes. In the kitchens their washing machines, fridge-freezers and all the appliances were built on stilts in preparation for the next flood. The residents were on the Floodline hotline all the time to find out when their homes were going to be flooded. I was there two weeks ago, when the water was coming right up to their homes.

The Minister will know that if a road is prone to flooding, people living at the top of the road where it does not flood will still find it almost impossible to get insurance for their home, and if they get insurance, the insurance company will charge an astronomical amount because they are, unfortunately, in a particular postcode.

I do not normally get passionate, but I am passionate about the proposal for a wet washlands scheme. I believe in listening to the professionals. I have visited the Environment Agency, based at the Oxon business park in Shrewsbury, on numerous occasions and asked, "How would you solve the problem of flooding, not just in Shrewsbury, but along the whole of the River Severn?" The answer from the Environment Agency—the professionals whose job it is to look at such issues—is that it wants to create a wet washlands project, meaning that 200 hectares of agricultural land in my constituency, near the village of Nesscliffe, would be flooded.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): My hon. Friend makes a good point. Farmers in my constituency are concerned, because although they understand that measures may need to be taken to protect the city of Gloucester from flooding, if their farmland is sacrificed and will flood more frequently, they expect proper compensation to be given. Perhaps the Minister will comment on that later.

Daniel Kawczynski: I agree. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that point. The farmers that I have spoken to in Nesscliffe are happy to come to some arrangement with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, whereby they would be paid to have their agricultural land flooded. Given the crisis that my farmers are facing at the moment—particularly dairy farmers—I think that that is a marvellous project, because the farmers would be paid to flood their land, thus protecting their income, while helping to manage the flooding on the River Severn.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate and on the passion that he is showing for the new scheme.

Kettering has a connection with the River Severn, because the River Avon rises in the village of Naseby and joins the Severn at Tewkesbury, so, in a way, I feel partly responsible for flooding incidence in the Severn. I join my hon. Friend in advocating the scheme, because it would help alleviate the flood risk and recompense farmers.

Daniel Kawczynski: I thank my hon. Friend for admitting that his constituency partly contributes to the problem.

The wet washlands scheme would mean storing the water on the 200 hectare site. The project would cost £36 million, but the benefits would amount to £70 million. I spoke to someone at the Environment Agency today and asked what savings of £70 million meant, and how I could justify the project to the Minister. He said, "The benefits are twofold. First, the Environment Agency has calculated that from all of these towns not flooding, all the homes not being destroyed and all the fridge-freezers, other appliances and everything else not being destroyed and having to be replaced, the savings would be £50 million. Secondly, there would be a £20 million saving in terms of environmental gain."

What does that mean? The Minister will recall the 1992 Earth summit in Rio. As part of the conclusions of that, the Government came up with something called the biodiversity action plan, which seeks to protect 391 species of plants and animals in 45 habitats. The plan is the blueprint for conservation in Britain, protecting birds such as snipe, redshank and lapwing.

This single project in Nesscliffe, involving the 200 hectares, would fulfil 100 per cent. of the Government's biodiversity action plan for the conservation of those birds and different plants. At times of the year, the wet washlands would be only a soggy marsh. That would encourage wildlife and birds, particularly in the breeding season, by providing more food. At other times, the wet washlands would have up to 1 m of water. That is where the water would be stored and thus it would not go into the River Severn and go further down the river.

I have spoken a lot about Shrewsbury, but there are obviously other towns on the River Severn. The Environment Agency says that the benefits of the scheme will extend all the way down to Worcester. The levels of water in Shrewsbury would be brought down by 1 m during flood times and in Worcester the figure would be as much as 0.25m.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing an important debate for his area, which has implications for the rest of the country. He obviously has a great depth of knowledge on this matter. Would he be surprised to learn that in my area, thousands of homes are being built on a flood plain because of the pressure from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister? I am fearful that my constituents might face some of the problems that my hon. Friend has described. Does he have any advice for the planners?

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Nice try, but the hon. Gentleman is way out of order. The motion is very specific indeed.

Daniel Kawczynski: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) for the point on affordable housing, which I mentioned. My council has a target of 500 affordable homes. It is extraordinary to imagine the amount of extra land that would be freed up for construction if the scheme was implemented. This is strategic, long-term thinking on behalf of the Government. If they make an investment of £36 million, the net gains to them—in extra land for affordable housing, and letting all these towns on the River Severn save extra money for themselves—would be incalculable.

I acknowledge that there are financial pressures and that it is easy for an Opposition politician to call for extra funding for their constituency. However, I and my constituents genuinely feel passionate about this. I urge the Minister to look seriously into any way that his Department could work alongside the Environment Agency to examine the scheme and see whether, with the Government's backing, it can proceed—and thus save Shrewsbury from all the misery that flooding creates.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. It is apparent that a considerable number of hon. Members wish to take part. Originally, four expressed a written interest and, as is the custom, I shall give them priority. Thereafter, it is a question of how brief each hon. Member is prepared to be. We have looked carefully at the map and I understand that every hon. Member present has some form of riparian interest in the Severn. We will do our best, but it really is up to hon. Members.

2.46 pm

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) on securing the debate. However, I warn him off using that excuse for the performance of Shrewsbury Town football club. We use it in Worcestershire for the performance of our cricket club, whose ground regularly floods. He cannot copy that excuse all the time.

However, I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the misery caused to home owners affected by flooding. I have had no more sobering experience as a result of becoming a Member of the House than that of visiting people who are wading through their flooded homes in wellington boots. The sight of fridges or freezers on bricks or breeze blocks is not uncommon in those properties.

You may not know this, Mr. Gale, but after the floods of autumn 2000, the River Severn group of MPs formed an inaugural grouping to tackle the issue of flooding along the river. Because of interest shown by other hon. Members, that group became established as the all-party parliamentary group on flood prevention. I have the pleasure of chairing that group, while the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) is one of its vice-chairs. It is all due to flooding along the River Severn that we have established that all-party group.

The Severn, as the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham said, has been flooding for years. In the worst flood in Worcester, in 1947, the river rose to 5.58 m above its normal summer level. That level of flooding affects 200 properties in the city of Worcester. While not wishing to be partisan, because my comment is not, I can understand why the Government's eye was taken off the ball regarding flood prevention, given the rather cyclical nature of flooding as it affects Worcester.

To take the Hylton Road in Worcester as an example, that floods at 4.2 m above normal summer level. In the five-year period between January 1955 and 1960, the river flooded six times. Then, between January 1965 and 1990, a 25-year period, the river flooded six times more. However, between January 1995 and 2005, a 10-year period, the river flooded nine times at that point—a considerable change in the frequency of flooding. That cyclical pattern has really drawn attention to the need to deal with flooding in places such as Worcester and Shrewsbury and the towns in between.

I too have worked with the Environment Agency to tackle flooding in the city, and have looked at the options that it has proposed. One attractive option is upstream storage, along the lines described by the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham. If I may use a pun, I do not want to pour cold water on his idea, but for Worcester to be protected by upstream storage so that the city of Worcester did not flood, it would require upland storage capacity of 127 million cu m of floodwater, which is two and a half times the volume of the Llyn Clywedog dam. That requires a huge expanse of land, but it is not available to be used to protect the city of Worcester.

I understand how an upland washland area could protect parts of the town of Shrewsbury, but once that river water comes down towards Worcester, there is no capacity above Worcester for the same level of upland storage. It would require something huge further upstream to deal with the problem. However, some policies can be tackled by the Government and the Environment Agency. Will the Minister explain what scope exists for the use of washlands that could mitigate some effects of flooding along the River Severn?

Let us consider other changes in upland land management, especially afforestation, that could reduce the flow of the rain falling on the Welsh hills and finding its way quickly into the River Severn. If we can slow down the progress of the rainfall, it might have a reduced impact on flooding. We must also deal with barriers that hold back the water, some of which are buildings that are constructed in flood plains. What changes are being proposed in PPG25 to stop councils erecting houses on flood plains and storing up misery for the residents in years to come?

Another policy that is often flagged up as the saviour of Worcester and other towns and cities is dredging. If it were to be a solution for Worcester, the river bed would have to be excavated to a depth of between 4 m and 5 m for the length of the river from Worcester downstream to Gloucester. It would make the river at Worcester tidal, which would affect water supplies because our drinking water comes from the River Severn. Admittedly, it is clean before it reaches us, but such measures would affect the habitat and the environment generally. Frankly, dredging is not an option that would solve Worcester's problems. That has been confirmed by Dr. Ian Maddock of University college, Worcester, who concluded that "dredging would be a very costly attempt to reduce flooding that is not viable on either economic or environmentally sustainable grounds".

We can put to bed the argument about dredging.

Let us now consider permanent flood defences. They would be options for parts of the city. Worcester has 11 identified areas that are known as flood cells, each of which is examined to see technically whether defences can be built. They are then assessed using cost-benefit analysis to see whether it is financially worth while to invest in them as a defence. Permanent defences cost a fortune because we have to sink them down to the bedrock before they are built up to prevent water going underneath the defences. As the hon. Member for Wyre Forest knows, huge costs were incurred when the Bewdley defences were installed.

In Worcester, five of the 11 flood cells have a positive cost-benefit analysis. In theory, that is good news. However, on the priority scoring system, they score between four and six points out of a maximum score of 44, which means that they will not be dealt with in the short term. Perhaps the Minister can write and explain to me and those residents who will be defended by the systems when it is likely that the Government priority score will come down into the region where the permanent defences can be built.

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that a significant problem occurs when there is a small number of properties within each cell, as a result of which the cost-benefit analysis often means that properties are not defended? It is a particular problem when the buildings are of historical significance within a cell. I am thinking of the Boat inn at Ironbridge, a popular local pub which floods regularly. Indeed, markings on the wall show the levels to which floods have progressed through the property over the years. Such property needs defences even though, in terms of cost-benefit analysis, the flood cells structure would not lead to its having defences at the moment.

Mr. Foster: My hon. Friend's conclusions are right. That is exactly our experience in Worcester, with five cells including those comprising 24, 19, 14 and 18 houses. They are small cells. It means that the system does not help us to score highly on the priority list.

There is some good news, with the use of temporary defences in Worcester and further upstream. They have been a phenomenal success. While it is desperate to walk inside people's houses in one's waders, with water and other things floating around, it is a surreal experience to walk along a perfectly dry road when the river level is 1 m above, held back in Worcester's case by pallet barriers. It is such a simple idea that I cannot believe that someone did not come up with it earlier. It has worked effectively for the businesses and properties along Hylton road.

Are the Government satisfied with the trial that was conducted along the River Severn, and do they intend to extend it to other parts of the country? I can assure those constituencies prone to flooding that it is such a simple system that road traffic still uses the road. It is defended against flooding and so are the properties.

I should like to extend the debate to include some of the Severn's tributaries that flow through the city of Worcester. Such places as Barbourne brook, Astwood brook and Duck brook in the city are more prone to flooding when the River Severn floods. In April 1998, Barbourne brook was the scene of about 100 flooded properties. It is a housing estate built on a flood plain, with a brook culverted underneath the estate, so one would not know that it was a flood plain area. To see an inshore lifeboat rescuing people from the first floor of their homes is a sight that one does not want to deal with every day.

I should like to place on the record my tribute to the Environment Agency for the way in which it has taken over the management of the watercourse at Barbourne brook, creating extra upland storage and clearing the culvert, so that even though there have been periods of heavy rain since it has taken over management, properties on the Blanquettes estate have not flooded again. I pay tribute to the Environment Agency staff for the way in which they deal with people whose properties are prone to flooding and explain the systems available, and for the vigour with which they tackle flooding issues.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way in a debate that I do not think will become politically rancorous. Does he share my concern that in drawing up flood defence schemes, the Environment Agency can be over-bureaucratic, which leads to delays?

Mr. Foster: I am afraid that I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. I would prefer the Environment Agency to take its time when coming up with a flooding solution that works and does not have adverse and unforeseen consequences on other parts of, for instance, the River Severn. When the left bank of the river at Bewdley was protected, there were concerns that it would increase the flood risk on the right bank. I would prefer the agency to take its time to show that that will not happen.

The same is true in such places as Worcester, where we have temporary defences. Before they were put up, I was assured that they would not adversely affect any other property in the city. If it takes time to do that, I do not mind. I do not agree that the agency is over-bureaucratic.

I should like to ask the Minister for his assessment of the capacity of the agency to deliver additional flood defences, particularly in terms of staff recruitment and the retention of skills and expertise of existing staff. I acknowledge and place on the record my belief that the extra investment given by the Treasury via DEFRA to the agency is welcome. I should like the Minister to reaffirm his Department's commitment to maintaining that level of investment, which not only protects homes and businesses, but conforms to the requirements of the Association of British Insurers, which insures those whose properties are prone to flooding. The extra investment is needed to ensure that those people remain part of the happy group that is starting to see solutions to the flood problems that have affected us for centuries.

3 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): I too congratulate the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) on raising this issue. I join him in welcoming what is perhaps a new, co-operative stance on the part of the Conservative party. However, I am slightly alarmed that it might be taking over my unique position of telling the Government when they are right and when they are wrong.

I am delighted to take part in the debate, because it gives me a great opportunity to thank the Government and the Environment Agency for everything that they have done in my constituency. I remember the November 2000 floods, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The water in Bewdley was 5.6 m above its normal level and huge chicken sheds were floating down the river, along with tree trunks as big as submarines. The Prime Minister came to Bewdley, and I observed him from the crowd—I was not an MP then—as he paddled over to the bit of the bridge that one could just get on to. The road was closed. The water was 4 ft up the doors of houses just up the river. The roads on the other side of the river were completely blocked and graceful swans were swimming in the middle of them.

During the floods just a couple of years ago, the demountable defences were up and they were magic. As the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) said, people can walk on the towpath and the quayside, and the water is 1.5 m above them. There is an eerie quietness. One looks into the drains and, to one's amazement, they are empty, because the underground flood defences and the pumps are working magnificently. I am also pleased to welcome the pallet-type defences on part of the Wribbenhall side of the river. They will not be trialled, because they have been trialled in other places, and they will be erected at the first warning of a significant flood. They will cause a certain amount of disruption, but we are very grateful for them. The underground works, the sewer connections and the pumps for the drains are all in place and ready.

I think that I can stray slightly from the Severn, Mr. Gale, and go precisely three miles, which is not as far as others have strayed, up one of its tributaries. The River Stour, which runs through Stourbridge, enters the Severn at Stourport. Above Kidderminster, a wet washlands has been established and it works brilliantly. A bund has been built across the area previously called Puxton marsh, which had sites of special scientific interest on it. A bridge with a relatively small hole through it has been built over the river. I have walked over the bridge when the river is low, and there is just a small flow through the bottom of the hole. I have also walked over the bridge when the river is in flood, and the hole is completely full of water, and the river is backing up above the bridge, restoring the wetland that used to exist at Puxton marsh. We are lucky that that land has never been valuable from the marketing point of view; in fact, only Belted Galloways, which are rather tough cattle, have been able to live on it because they can eat rougher stuff. Those issues are therefore no longer causing trouble, and the amount of water that can now flow through Kidderminster town centre is strictly limited and flooding will not occur.

I now want to ask some questions and I hope to get some answers. Members of the all-party flood group, which the hon. Member for Worcester mentioned, very much welcome the Norwich Union flood maps, which go into tremendous detail. Some parts of the country are covered with metre contours, while others are covered with half-metre contours, which means that there is the theoretical possibility of completely avoiding postcode flood risk. Is that approach working yet? For example, do people in the DY12 postcode, who are 400 ft above the river, no longer have to pay the same extortionate insurance premiums as those who are still liable to be flooded? Do households that are now effectively protected pay lower premiums?

The other spin-off of the tremendous flood mapping is the possibility of allowing people who want to sell their houses to make it clear that they are in an area that is completely free from flood risk. I hope that that is being implemented.

Finally, we have heard from hon. Members about isolated properties and farms where people have built dykes round their property. In parts of Stourport, it is extraordinarily difficult to protect an industrial estate and a residential area. Will there be support for people with houses that cannot be protected to make the adaptations to their houses that make them relatively resistant to floods—for example, suitable flooring, plastering and cavity wall insulation? During the flood in Worcester that the hon. Member for Worcester mentioned, no one expected part of the area to flood and the cavity wall insulation used meant that people were kept out of their houses for ages.

The National Flood Forum ran many fairs to tell people how to adapt their houses and I hope that they will continue. I pay tribute to Gill Holland of Bewdley who was a director of the National Flood Forum and was instrumental in running many of those fairs. I understand that she has just had a hip replacement and, while off sick, found that her job had disappeared. I hope that the Minister will be able to give some answers on insurance and unprotectable properties.

I thank the Minister, the Environment Agency and Severn Trent Water for all their work in my area.

3.7 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I took careful note of what you said, Mr. Gale, and will try to keep my comments short.

I welcome the debate and congratulate the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) on securing it. We shall shortly leave for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee to discuss this and other issues and we will be meeting the Environment Agency tomorrow morning. I pay due respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) and the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) for their work with the all-party flood prevention group, which has always been informative and has given us an opportunity for dialogue with different agencies.

I want to make a few general comments about the River Severn and then speak about a specific case, which I hope the Minister will be able to advance. I then want to come to an open-ended conclusion on some of the issues relating to how we treat water, which is directly relevant to the River Severn.

In the main, I support the Environment Agency and allied organisations, including the water companies. They are now treating the threat of flooding more seriously and I am pleased that we are consulted almost to death in attempts to engage with MPs, councillors and other representatives. We wait expectantly for the final presentation of the lower Severn scheme, which I believe will be available in the new year. I have been able to take part on a number of occasions in the consultation on how that is being put together.

The Government have put many more resources into the problem. The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment has on a number of occasions shown that the Government are serious about the problem. My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester mentioned the need for new planning guidance. Monday's announcement by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister was an advance on that. We hope that that will now be taken forward and will provide clarity on the planning process.

I largely support the Environment Agency and what it is trying to do. There has been greater clarity in the cost-benefit analysis so we now understand which particular parts of the catchment area around the Severn are likely to get works and which are not. My area tends to flood in extremis. We have an unusual situation, as the area is tidal and water also comes down the Severn. However, when we get hit, like the constituency of the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper), we get hit badly. That was the case at the end of the last millennium, which resulted in a large part of the no th of my constituency flooding.

As a result, the Environment Agency spent considerable sums on bringing up to scratch the flood protection measures, which largely take the form of banks. The banks were reinforced and taken back to their current level. We did not ask for them to be increased because, as I will make clear, that is a zero-sum game, as has already been alluded to. If someone has their area protected more, someone else will get the floods. I would be happier if we were able to say that we had a coherent strategy rather than for the area that was the last to ask the Minister for extra money or to approach the Environment Agency to be landed with the problems.

We are not asking for physical schemes. Indeed, apart from where there are clear requirements, such as in an urban situation where a large number of properties are at risk, we should not look for physical schemes. We should use the river, understand that it has its organic way of doing things and learn not necessarily to love it but to live with it.

[Mr. David Drew]

Slightly contrary to what the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham said, DEFRA grants are already in place for farmers who are willing and able to allow their land to flood. As we go into a regime of rural development regulations, there should be more opportunity for that. I am glad to agree with the hon. Gentleman; I do not see this as anything other than a good move. If we are to pay farmers to do something that is of tremendous value to a wider population, let us pay them and use the skill that comes with them as the guardians of it. I welcome that move, and we should link with it ideas such as reed beds.

We cannot concentrate simply on the pure aspects of flooding; sewerage is an issue as well. The idea that we can physically build our way out of all the problems is a myth. The sooner we understand that and consider low-technology answers, the sooner we will all be happier. They are cheaper and, in the long run, they are sustainable and better. I hope that we will do that.

I come on to a particular problem. I am not a provocative person, as the Minister knows, but it has been gnawing away at the back of my mind for some months. It is a difficult problem, which concerns an area called Frampton on Severn. It was identified in the famous flood maps, which have largely been useful, as an area subject to flooding. It has flooded in the past but not recently. The problem is that Frampton on Severn's coastal protections—the Severn is effectively coastal in that area—have largely eroded.

The Environment Agency's response has been that the Gloucester-Sharpness canal is a flood protection device if the water comes over the coastal protections, which, as I said, are badly eroded. Although British Waterways will not say categorically that it is not a flood protection, it will not agree—certainly not on paper—that it is. There are two obvious reasons for that. First, it could end up with the bill. The canal banks, which are not strong enough to withstand a huge volume of water, have fallen in in the past. More particularly—the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) will have a view on this—the canal supplies water to Bristol Water, which provides the water that some of his constituents drink. It is not terribly clever to have a flood protection device that is likely to have an impact on the water supply.

Along with the parish council of Frampton on Severn, I have been trying to get some answers and therefore ask the Minister to take up the issue. We want clarification on whether the canal is a flood protection device. The answer cannot go both ways. In effect, two public bodies are each looking in their own direction and trying to avoid the issue. There is no problem until a flood occurs, but if that happens and there are questions about who was right and whether there was an effective flood protection device, it could be too late.

Things got so bad that the parish council felt that it had to submit a freedom-of-information inquiry to the Environment Agency to try to get clarification. That is not good enough. This is an important issue, and I hope that the Minister will provide clarity. I do not expect an easy answer or one that necessarily has the agreement of all sides, but there must be a statement on paper about a flood protection device in that area.

To conclude, I am pleased that the Environment Agency has been working with the water companies. They should not be excluded from discussions about the Severn area, the implications for water supply and, indeed, the quality of water, in which I have become increasingly interested. We should do much more to understand the microbiological issues relating to water.

I hope that the Minister will take on board these general comments. I would like us to think about water a little more holistically. A bid was made for EU LIFE funding to examine the water catchment area not just of the Severn but of the River Frome tributary, but, sadly, the bid has not gone anywhere. I hope that the Government are serious about considering how these different issues can be brought together so that we can get a much better understanding of the water chain and manage all these things more effectively. Finally, as always, I ask for a real explanation of what is happening about flood protection around Frampton on Severn.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Roger Gale (in the Chair): Order. Will hon. Members keep an eye on the clock, please? I need to call the Front-Bench spokesmen at 3.25.

3.18 pm

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Gale. I shall try to keep my comments to an absolute minimum. I am delighted to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) on introducing the debate and to say—it is not only in the interests of the new consensual atmosphere that we do not want to score political points—that the problem we are dealing with on the River Severn is an incredible natural phenomenon.

I am very familiar with that phenomenon, as I have lived around that area all my life and have even surfed on the river on occasion. The river is remarkable because it has the second highest tidal range in the world, which means that, several times each year, we experience the phenomenon of the Severn bore. The amount of water gushing up the Severn is so great that it forms a wave and takes the entire tide behind it. One minute it is low tide, the next it is like being on an elevator.

The Severn bore leads to problems further along the estuary, which is the area that I am particularly concerned about, as it is adjacent to my constituency. It has been subject to flooding since Roman times, and there has been a flood defence of some sort there since then. The flood defences have gradually been raised as development has increased.

As I said, the river has a remarkable tidal range. During the past 20 years or so, there have also been surges on top of very large tides. A tidal surge is a water level that is much higher than that which the tides suggest, and on two occasions in the past 15 years, the tidal surge has come up to the level of the flood banks. If the tidal surge ever comes on top of one of the highest predicted tides, the water level will be 1 m over the flood banks. That has been known for several years.

As I said, on two occasions—in 1983 and 1990—the water level was at the top of the banks and coming over. There is already a huge amount of development in the area—housing, factories and schools—and a lot more is planned by Newport borough council on the sites of the old Llanwern steel works. That will be a very big housing development. For 10 to 12 years, there have been calls for the Environment Agency to do something about the flood bank and flood defence scheme from Cardiff to Chepstow, in my constituency. The Environment Agency has said that it will do it, but there have been various delays, some of which I think result partly from reorganisation of the local flood defence committees, although they would deny that.

The works are scheduled to start in 2007, but it is possible that building work will continue before that. It is not being apocalyptic to suggest that because of the natural phenomenon there could be a very bad flood in the area. That is not only possible, but, statistically, almost certain to happen at some point—it could be tomorrow or not for another 50 years. However, there will certainly be a water level far higher than the current flood defences can cope with.

I urge the Minister to investigate what the Environment Agency is doing between Chepstow and Cardiff, and particularly between Chepstow and Newport, as work has started on a section between Newport and Cardiff. I also urge him to get an assurance that, if the work must wait until 2007, it will definitely start in that year. I have nothing more than that to say, because we are all committed to ensuring that we do not get a repeat of the problems of 2000.

The problems with the River Severn can also cause flooding elsewhere, on tributary rivers. The Severn is tidal as far as Bigsweir. Living in Monmouth, where there were terrible floods in 2000, I believe that that has an impact on rivers such as the Wye and the Monnow that flow into it, although the Environment Agency denies it. The agency has been responsible for helping to agree a flood defence scheme for Monmouth to prevent a repeat of what happened in 2000, but it has not been my experience that it dealt with that as quickly as one would want, although it is going ahead now. We all agree that we need to do more to solve such problems, and I hope that the Minister looks into the matter and obtains assurances.

3.23 pm

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I admit that when the debate came up and we started looking for a Liberal Democrat Front Bencher to speak about the River Severn, we discovered that our leader had not appointed one. Someone noticed from the map that my home is 2 miles from the Severn bridge, so I was held to have some interest in the subject. When someone said, "What we really need is a Severn bore," my name came up again.

Wearing the spokesman's hat for this debate on behalf of my party, I congratulate the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) on bringing this important issue to the House. Clearly, from the number of hon. Members who have attended and taken part in the debate, it is of considerable concern across the party divide. However, it would be wrong to say that nothing has been done. Things have been moving, and the hon. Gentleman properly paid tribute to the work that has been done. I agree about that.

Parenthetically, I always believe that in such matters prevention is better than cure, and, understandably, we have focused our remarks on dealing with the consequences of flooding in the Severn area. Will the Minister comment briefly on his Department's views about the causes of increased flood risk? There are those, for example, who say that the problem we are discussing has its origins in climate change. Is that the Department's view? Does the Minister think that, as well as putting up higher and higher defences and trying to find somewhere for the water to go, central Government have, critically, more of a role to play earlier on—upstream, one might say—in the process? Perhaps they should do more to limit the problems that we are talking about. However, there is clearly a problem to be dealt with now, whereas many of the issues that I am referring to are long term.

The debate has been structured very cleverly by you, Mr. Gale, as you called first Members concerned about tidal flooding further up the Severn—more broadly to the north—while the later contributions came from the hon. Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies), who discussed the parts of the Severn that suffer from flooding and tidal flooding, and in some cases from a combination of the two. The issues that relate to the two sorts of flooding are different, and the defences that work in one case will not necessarily work in another.

I was encouraged by the effectiveness of the temporary flood barriers, about which the hon. Members for Worcester (Mr. Foster) and for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) spoke warmly. I have a copy of the Environment Agency's February 2004 evaluation of temporary flood barriers in the Severn valley. I shall quote from a local newspaper, with no prospect of any possible gain from featuring in it. In February 2004, the Shropshire Star said:

> "People have always said nothing can be done. From this week the mindset has been totally changed forever."

The rules have changed, and

> "the old consensus that nothing can be done was replaced by the knowledge that something can be done."

That is encouraging to hear.

How far will the Minister's Department press the Environment Agency to expand those temporary flood defences? The cost-benefit analysis in the economic appraisal of the trials is overwhelmingly positive. The ratio of benefit to cost of the temporary barriers in Shrewsbury is 10:1. It is just over 2:1 in Worcester, so Shrewsbury should obviously be the priority. I say that in deference to the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham.

Despite those powerful arguments in favour of the temporary barriers, the tenor of the document is quite cautious:

> "This sort of high profile trial is bound to raise expectations of residents. Clearly this has been the result ... The tremendous media coverage has also ensured other residents and communities, currently not enjoying target standards of flood relief, will also expect to see temporary defences evaluated as an alternative to 'do nothing'."

That is clearly the case. How far is the use of temporary barriers integral to the Government's strategy? They are more flexible, and are popular and effective. Is that the direction in which things will go?

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): My hon. Friend knows, as do other hon. Members, that the source of the Severn is in my constituency, and that I have a passion for—and, perhaps, an intimate interest in—weather forecasting. [Interruption.] Yes; think about it.

Mr. Michael Foster: Very good.

Lembit Öpik: Thank you.

Does my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) accept that the difficulty with temporary barriers—and, indeed, permanent structures—is that they often unload the problem further downstream? Therefore, we still need to look at other ways of mitigating the river flow. The big question involves not dredging, but whether there is some way to employ the farming community to assist, on an incentivised basis, by preventing the water from turning up in those urban and high-flood-risk areas.

Steve Webb: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. The general tenor of the remarks made so far is a warm welcome to the idea—a warm front, one might say—of using farmland and farmers, particularly given the troubles that many of our farmers are having. The idea is that they should be effectively compensated and enabled to contribute to tackling the flood risk.

I note that the Government strategy on this issue goes under the euphemistic title, "Making space for water", which water seems to have a knack of doing for itself. I quote from a project officer in the Environment Agency, Loreta Adams, who says that engineering alone—sticking up defences—

"cannot protect people and the environment from all floods. We need to balance our investment in defences with efforts to develop innovative ways of managing floods, so that we can minimise the risk of flooding into the future."

That has been one of the messages of today's debate.

On a slightly critical note, I want to raise with the Minister the issue of urgency. The original basis for the debate, in the interests of the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham, was the flooding in 2000. I am worried that things have drifted a little, although there have been individual cases of action. I have here a document called the "River Severn Strategy", which was produced by the Environment Agency in 2000 and which says that it would start a tidal Severn strategic study in 2001 to address flooding between Gloucester and Avonmouth. Yet, towards the end of 2004, we heard that there would be a consultation lasting until March 2005 on the River Severn flood management strategy for the tidal section of the river—that is five years on.

Will the Minister say how far have we got in five years, particularly with regard to the tidal section of the Severn? Five years is quite a long time. Given the risks we are talking about, how soon will it be before the strategy documents and consultations result in effective action?

The role of the Environment Agency is critical. We need it to respond promptly when local authorities are assessing planning applications to build on flood plains. That point has been raised by a number of hon. Members. There appears to be some criticism that the agency is not always doing that. Worcester was mentioned as one council that has had to deal with the agency's taking too long. Other authorities have criticised the agency. It is reported that the agency has accepted that in a fifth of cases in which local authorities have made decisions without it, it is the agency that is at fault for not giving sufficiently prompt feedback.

Will the Minister reassure us that—perhaps in the context of the review of planning policy guidance note 25, which has already been raised—the Environment Agency can be enabled or encouraged to respond more promptly? When local authorities are trying to assess planning applications for flood plain areas, clearly the Environment Agency's perspective is critical. When local authorities are minded to resist applications, but do not have the teeth of the Environment Agency behind them, that can make things difficult, particularly when there is so much pressure to accept house building in particular areas. The local authorities need the Environment Agency to be there and to speak out strongly. I hope the Minister can assure us that he will ensure that the agency acts more promptly.

To draw my observations to a close, can the Minister say something about what scale of spending on flood management and flood defences will be up to the task? I am aware of the £570 million a year that the Department says it is spending on those areas, but my impression from talking to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), who shadows the Department, is that its own assessment is that it needs to spend more than that. In a sense, the budget is obviously constrained, but the Department's assessment is that it needs additional resources to manage the flood risk. Perhaps it is being thwarted by the Treasury. If the Minister agrees, we can work together and lobby the Treasury in a non-partisan spirit. Clearly, there is a question whether the Department feels sufficiently resourced to tackle the problems we are talking about.

We have heard eloquent testimony from a number of hon. Members about the inevitable problems that flooding creates for businesses and residents. If flooding is becoming more prevalent, long drawn-out consultations, strategic plans and all the rest of it are all very well, but there is an urgency to the matter, which I hope I have been able to convey to the Minister.

We welcome the steps that have already been taken and some of the innovations that have been made, but many of us who represent areas along the Severn still feel that our constituents are vulnerable and that we need action on defences and managing water in other ways, as well as, fundamentally, action on the causes of the increased flooding risk—an area in which the Government could be doing a great deal more.

3.33 pm

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I recognise that I do not have any direct constituency link to the River Severn, but I have shadow responsibilities. I echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) about my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), who would have been here had he not been speaking in the Chamber. Not only would he have spoken from a constituency point of view, he probably would have done the job that I am doing in speaking on behalf of the Opposition.

During the debate, much has been made of the issue of the new, consensual approach to politics. I entirely support it, but it is not actually new as far as I am concerned. I think that the Minister would agree that, during the time we have been working opposite each other, our approach has been largely consensual. Indeed, I have gone so far as to say that DEFRA has in him an excellent Minister; albeit it has taken eight years to find one. In all fairness, I must say that it is equally unusual to hear the Liberals accepting responsibility for anything, so to have the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) metaphorically hold up a sign and say, "The flood starts here," was welcome.

To be serious, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham, as others have done, on what I understand is his first debate in Westminster Hall. It is on a subject of great importance not only to his constituency but to the many other constituencies affected by the flooding of the Severn. It also raises issues that are common in many other constituencies; indeed, flooding is not unknown in my area, a third of which is below sea level. We are familiar with the fen washes, which were designed 400 years ago by Vermuyden to take the surplus water and to expel it from the area. My home is only 7 ft above sea level, so I am fully familiar with the problem.

Some key points have been raised in the debate. First, many hon. Members referred to the huge cost of flooding—not only the financial cost but the emotional cost—to individuals, businesses and communities. Secondly, some have mentioned the overall trend, which shows an increasing incidence of flooding. The hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) referred to different time scales and demonstrated a cyclical approach. If he took a longer time scale, he would find that that trend is towards an increasing number of incidents. The Office of Science and Technology estimated that without action to tackle climate change, the cost of flooding could rise twenty-fold during the present century. That partly answers the point raised by the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb).

It is not climate change only that is at the root of the problem. As hon. Members have said, new developments speed run-off. The Environment Agency published its flood maps just over a year ago. That was a significant step forward, but the maps were probably insufficiently detailed. The Norwich Union maps referred to earlier were considerably better but even they were not accurate enough for many individual properties. I can tell the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) that although 0.5 m is a detail on a map, it is significant when seeking to discover whether a property is at risk of flooding. I know of many property owners who have had insurance problems whose properties have never been flooded, even though a property just down the road had been. It is crucial that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister should ensure that development does not take place on flood plains. Like the hon. Gentleman, I look forward to hearing what will happen to PPG25.

I shall address some of the specific issues raised during the debate. I generally support the principle of catchment management plans as developed by the Government. It is the right way forward, as it takes account of all the water in a catchment area. I strongly support the principle of what I call soft protection—soft management—in preference to the sort of hard defences mentioned today. I fear that the country has far too many concrete channels that no longer have sufficient capacity to take the high-speed run-offs from upstream, which has resulted in urban flooding.

If you will permit me to digress for 15 seconds, Mr. Gale, whenever I welcome constituents or friends to the House I show them the chart by the steps up to St. Stephen's entrance. The chart shows what has happened to the Thames over the years, and it shows that Parliament is built on what used to be the river. It shows how the sea wall has moved over the centuries to where we now enjoy it; beyond the Terrace. That shows how development is constantly expecting the channels that remove the water to take ever more. Squeezing watercourses like that is unnatural. As the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) said, it does not reflect the natural dynamism of rivers or watercourses. Those aspects need to be taken into account. Those who have lived near rivers in the countryside have seen what has happened over the years and understand the problem.

Mr. Drew: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Paice: I would rather not, if the hon. Gentleman does not mind; I am trying to keep to time, as we all want to hear what the Minister has to say.

Soft defences are obviously not enough; as hon. Members have said, hard defences and temporary defences are essential. Indeed, I was interested to hear about the temporary defences; I had not heard of pallet barriers before. Like many other hon. Members, I believe that reform of the common agricultural policy and the development of pillar II money will create a significant opportunity for flood management to be better integrated into our general land use policies. Although as an individual I am averse to destroying good agricultural land, which over the past 40 or 50 years we have been paying farmers to reclaim from marshes so that we can produce more and better food, it seems a bit strange quickly to reverse tack and suggest developing wetland marshes. Nevertheless, it is sensible to develop flood plains, and if we can use rural development money to do so, that seems wise. As my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham said, in addition to flood prevention, the development of flood plains has significant conservation and biodiversity attributes.

I shall certainly not use this opportunity to suggest one or other solution to the problems of the Severn. The one lesson that we can draw from this debate is that there is no single solution; there are a number of solutions for different parts of the route of the Severn and for different communities. However, before I embrace the idea wholeheartedly, I want to challenge the Government and ask the Minister what work has been done on other options apart from the use of water catchment on flood plains and marshlands. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire would have made these points if he had been present.

In particular, what work has been done on collection further upstream, into the genuine uplands, where, to pick up the point made by the hon. Member for Worcester, reservoirs may be appropriate to retain water, but may also be used, as they traditionally were, as a source of water? That may not necessarily be in the area of the Severn, but—if I may be parochial, Mr. Gale, and you may well agree with me, not that you can—may be in the south-east, which, because of the rush to development, faces serious water shortage problems. I suspect that it will not be many years before there will have to be a much greater water transfer between the west of the country and the east. Therefore, water catchment for consumption is also an issue.

There is also the possibility of using uplands reservoirs as a source of hydroelectric power, again given the consensus that we need to move further towards renewable energy; water would be preferable to wind power. However, here we bring together different aspects of Government; not just the Environment Agency but the ODPM and the Department for Trade and Industry because of its responsibility for energy. Hon. Members will no doubt think of other Departments that should also be involved. Therefore, although the wetlands strategy is attractive, it is not down simply to the Environment Agency to produce the solution; other organs of government must be involved.

The people of Shrewsbury and Atcham, who I am sure will appreciate their MP's debate and the fact that he has taken the initiative, and all the other people in the towns and villages along the course of the Severn will look to the Government for action. Not to be too critical, my own experience of the Environment Agency is similar to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies); speed is not necessarily the first attribute that one would give it.

Most important, we need action. We have got used to lots of reviews, strategies and plans, but they do not prevent flooding, although they might produce a pretty massive physical barrier if they were all stacked up on top of one another. It is important to turn them into action. My hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham has produced some ideas. He has taken the Environment Agency's ideas for the wetland, which has many attributes. We would all welcome not only the Minister's responses but his commitment to action.

3.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): I congratulate the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) on securing this debate and I thank him for his new consensual style, which I think informed the rest of the debate—and very well informed and consensual it was too. I also thank my hon. Friends the Members for Worcester (Mr. Foster) and for Stroud (Mr. Drew), the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) and others for their positive comments about the Environment Agency. It was especially good to hear from the hon. Member for Wyre Forest about the action that has been taken in Bewdley in particular.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment is abroad and therefore cannot be here to respond to the debate, but clearly, climate change is an issue in the context of this debate. I am sure that we all wish him well in the negotiations in Montreal that he is currently enjoying.

As we have heard, flooding is a traumatic experience. It is costly in material terms, in disruption to people's lives and psychologically, in terms of stress and worry. I have great sympathy with those who have suffered damage and distress as a result of flooding and those who are worried that flooding will affect their lives in future. Following the rainfall last week, my wife received an automated call from Floodline to warn us of the threat to our home from the River Wey, so I personally have a lot of sympathy for those at risk of flooding and I appreciate the efficiency of that automated service. I was also pleased to visit the River Severn in Worcestershire over the summer.

Before I turn to the particularities and make some more local points about the Severn, I want to set out the national background. Because of the importance of flooding and the worry that it causes, the Government have made flood risk management a priority area, with significantly increased real-terms funding and the most thorough public review of policy in this area for many years. We estimate that between 4 million and 5 million people live in areas at risk of flooding and assets totalling some £250 billion are involved. We calculate flood risk as a measure of both the probability of flooding and its consequences.

I say to the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) that the probability of flooding might well increase as a result of climate change and sea level rise, while the damage caused will increase along with both the risk to national wealth and further development. I will return to development on flood plains. In line with the majority, I need to focus more on the consequences of flooding rather than its causes.

There is a huge challenge for the Government, the operating authorities and those at risk. DEFRA has overall policy responsibility for flood risk in England, and we work in partnership with the Environment Agency, which is the principal operating authority for managing the risks. The agency's flood risk management activities are largely funded by DEFRA and it operates within the framework of guidance issued by us. We agree its corporate plan, which sets the outputs that we expect it to deliver on our behalf.

As I say, the Government have provided large increases in funding for flood risk management over recent years; the total expenditure on management of flood and coastal erosion risk will be some £570 million this year and for each of the next two years, compared with £310 million about eight years ago—coincidentally. We will use the money to maintain the Environment Agency's excellent capacity, and its excellent staff, in dealing with the challenge. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester for his kind comments about the staff.

Hon. Members will understand that this is about risk management, because we have to recognise that we cannot prevent flooding completely and there is not an infinite amount of money that can be spent on the problem, however much any of us in this Chamber would want to spend. Any of us in Government would probably in the end agree with that. I would also advise the hon. Member for Northavon that as part of the next comprehensive spending review we will again look thoroughly at how we apply the resource to this particular problem.

The measures that we take include the building of flood defences to reduce the probability of flooding and go beyond that, to embrace a range of approaches for reducing the consequences of flooding when it does occur. They include public awareness campaigns, flood warning and emergency planning, together with seeking to avoid increasing risk through inappropriate new development on the flood plain.

From a flood risk management perspective, in addition to significantly increased funding since 1997, we are also addressing the challenge through "Making space for water: Developing a new Government strategy for flood and coastal erosion risk management in England", to which the hon. Member for Northavon referred. That is a thorough re-examination of policy to set our direction for the next 20 years or so. We are undertaking a wide consultation with all interested bodies.

In March, my hon. Friend the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment published the Government's first response to views expressed in our consultation on a new strategy, and that gave greater prominence to the role that flood resilience and resistance can play in managing flood risk effectively. As a result, we are also exploring whether it will be practical to provide some form of financial assistance to households in areas where community defences cannot be justified to make their homes more flood resilient and flood resistant. I hope that Members who raised that matter will be pleased to hear that we are considering that—including, perhaps, for the Boat inn in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright).

Several hon. Members raised the issue of development in areas at risk from flooding. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister recently initiated a public consultation on proposals for strengthening and updating guidance to planning authorities on avoiding inappropriate development in areas at flood risk. The new planning policy statement 25 includes a measure giving the Environment Agency a statutory role in relation to development and flood risk, with the possibility of calling in major development proposals that planning authorities intend to approve against sustained Environment Agency objection, which would then be considered by the Deputy Prime Minister.

Although our investment is making real improvements possible across the country, there will always be the need to prioritise the proposals that should receive funding first from among all those that meet the basic criteria. My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester discussed that at some length in his comments on the flood cells in his constituency. I have sympathy with the points that he makes and the households concerned, but proposals for schemes around the country and in our river catchments are generated bottom-up from the operating authorities working with communities to find solutions to flooding problems. They are then prioritised in the programme through an objective prioritisation system, to ensure that the country gets maximum benefit from our investment. At present, our prioritisation system only covers funding for capital improvement projects, as distinct from maintenance, but we are working on new output and performance measures, which will increasingly be used to guide investment decisions to maximise benefits. They will give greater flexibility to the Environment Agency in particular to allocate its own funding, including making choices between capital and maintenance work so as best to maximise the outputs that we seek.

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment announced yesterday that we have a fully approved programme of grant-aided projects for 2006–07. Schemes that have already started, or have already been approved, will be fully funded. Some authorities will be disappointed that, unlike in previous years, there will be little scope for approval of further projects for grant in-year, but the high level of commitment for approved and ongoing projects significantly adds to the certainty that the full works programme will be implemented as planned.

Having outlined the national context, I now turn to the specifics of the River Severn. The Severn is one of our major rivers, and it presents a considerable challenge in terms of flood risk. Reflecting that, the Environment Agency has invested some £100 million over the past five years in the Severn catchment, with significantly improved defences in Cheltenham and Bewdley, and some significant improvement in Shrewsbury. In the constituency of the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham, the Environment Agency has completed a £3.5 million flood risk management improvement project for the Frankwell area of Shrewsbury, from which 74 households will benefit. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that.

In some locations on the Severn, the Environment Agency has been unable to justify investment in permanent defences. Instead, it has trialled the use of temporary defences—at Ironbridge and at Worcester, for example, and in Shrewsbury at Abbey Foregate and Coleham Head. Those defences are stored locally and put in place temporarily at times of high flood risk. We have heard how effective they are, but it should be said that they particularly suit the nature of the Severn. I stress to the hon. Member for Northavon in particular that the Severn is slow to rise at times of flood, which makes the river particularly suitable for deploying defences of this type. As we look at rolling out this technique, which has been so successful in this situation, we must bear in mind the rapidity with which a river would rise, because there is not much point in having a temporary structure if there is not sufficient time to put it in place.

For the longer term, the Environment Agency has produced a draft fluvial Severn strategy. That has been sent for comment to a broad range of consultees, including Members of Parliament for the affected areas, with the aim of its being finalised in 2006. It considers a number of options for all flood-prone areas along the River Severn and, together with the Environment Agency's River Severn catchment flood management plan, will provide the agency with a framework for managing flood risk in the longer term.

The scope in the immediate future for further major flood risk improvement works in Shrewsbury is subject to investment being worth while within cost-benefit terms and the relative priorities that I talked about. However, the Environment Agency will continue to look for opportunities to reduce risk that are feasible and economic. For example, subject to planning consent, it plans to undertake improvements to defences in the town, including some permanent walls and temporary defences at Abbey Foregate and Coleham Head. The agency will also support any appropriate local defences that individual property owners may wish to build.

Now I turn to what the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham said in respect of wet washlands. That is a scheme in which I, as Minister for biodiversity, am especially interested because of its potential environmental gains. The agency is considering the viability of that large flood storage project, which could offer improved protection for some 1,000 properties along the Severn from Shrewsbury downstream to Worcester, as well as providing additional habitat. It is an example of just the sort of multi-functional project that we wish to encourage. However, planning is at an early stage; some quite complicated negotiation would be required.

The agency will need carefully to consider the full potential impacts, environmental and otherwise, of such a project—including the effects on fisheries and navigation. When I visited the Severn, there were barges with aggregate in them on the river. A full assessment of the costs and benefits, including potential payments to landowners and land managers, will need to be made. The agency will also want to consider joint funding with other partners, particularly those who have a more direct interest in the biodiversity gains that the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham talked so passionately about. I cannot make any definite commitment, but the agency is certainly looking at it seriously.

Mr. Drew: Does my hon. Friend agree that one way forward, which we could look at carefully, is to extend the water framework directive more rapidly to other estuaries? At the moment, we are only looking at Ribble valley. Would we not be advised to look at the Severn too?

Jim Knight: I will certainly ensure that my hon. Friend the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment is aware of my hon. Friend's comments on the water framework directive, and how it might be used there.

I want to comment on the wider issue of absorbability in regard to wet washlands—that is, the use of habitat and upland management to improve things. A number of hon. Members talked about wet washlands, and I am also enthusiastic; I raised the subject today when I was being briefed by officials. We are keen to see those sort of "win/wins" take place. However, I should caution that while they can have good local effects, they will have no great impact in terms of the catastrophic 1 in 100 or 1 in 50 flooding events. They are useful, and we should certainly attend to them, but I would not want it believed that they are the answer to everything.

The hon. Members for Shrewsbury and Atcham and for Wyre Forest talked in particular about insurance—an important issue for us all. My hon. Friend the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment recently announced to the House that our action to reduce flood risk has allowed the Association of British Insurers to renew its statement of principles so that cover continues to be widely available in flood risk areas. That new statement comes into effect next month and creates a rolling commitment to provide flood cover where flood defences are either in place or being planned. It is directly linked to the commitment that this Government have made to improve flood risk management. It will help considerably with those individual property owners that the hon. Member for Wyre Forest talked about, but they should be talking to their insurers about the risks and cover.

Where householders live in an area at significant risk of flooding but there are no plans for improved defences within the next five years, they need to have those discussions so that insurers will make their best efforts to provide flood cover, and work with customers to take measures that allow insurance to continue. Those might include reducing the risk to individual properties, or making them more resilient to flood damage by local action.

It remains our highest priority to reduce the risk to life from flooding. Flood warning arrangements continue to be strengthened throughout the Severn catchment, with the Environment Agency investing some £1 million in total over the last three years. I will write to the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies), and to my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud about their particular issues, but the tidal Severn flood management strategy will be published early next year.

I thank all hon. Members for the debate, which has been very useful and has given the Government an opportunity to explain the reasons for our national policy and to explain the action relevant to the River Severn. I hope that all hon. Members will understand that although work has been done and more is being considered, we need to justify all expenditure of taxpayers' money, including any possible investment in new defences.

Trade (India)

4 pm

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): I am very grateful to have secured this short debate on United Kingdom trade with India. There are many different issues on which one could focus under such a broad title, but I shall use the short time available to me to focus on one question; what further steps should we take to boost UK exports to India?

I contend, as the Minister will have gathered from the strong hint in my contribution in Trade and Industry questions last Thursday, that although UK exports to India have increased, we are not capturing a large enough share of the enormous growth in India's international trade. There are no narrow partisan points to be scored, and the purpose of the debate is in no way to talk down the progress that has already been achieved or to criticise the efforts of Ministers and their officials at UK Trade and Investment to boost our exports further.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way so early in his remarks in this very important debate. There is concern about the shift in UKTI's focus away from export promotion towards inward investment, which is one of the issues that the Select Committee on Trade and Industry considered in its inquiry into trade and investment relations with India. I hope that my hon. Friend will encourage businesses and other organisations to contribute to that inquiry.

Mr. Crabb: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. I was aware of that concern, and I look forward to seeing the outcome of the Select Committee inquiry.

This afternoon, I want to ask what I hope will prove to be useful and helpful questions and observations about our need to make even more progress in developing the Indo-British trade relationship. At the beginning of September, I had the pleasure of visiting India with the Conservative party's shadow Foreign Secretary and two other new Members of the House. It was not my first visit to the country, but I returned from that trip with a huge sense of optimism and excitement about what is happening in India right now. Driving around New Delhi, we saw the signs of serious economic activity all around us; new roads, new bridges and major pieces of infrastructure being built.

We visited Ranbaxy's new state-of-the art research and development facility at Gurgaon and the new Fortis hospital at Noida. We met the Confederation of Indian Industry and the National Association of Software and Service Companies, as well as various Ministers. Everywhere we went, the message communicated to us was one of huge enthusiasm for a growing trading relationship with the UK, and a desire for UK companies properly to understand the exciting prospects of doing business in India.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Will my hon. Friend join me in welcoming the fact that many companies are outsourcing jobs to India and that call centres are being set up there, because that is a means of raising standards of living in the third world and something of which we should not be afraid?

Mr. Crabb: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. We should not be afraid of it at all, and companies should certainly consider outsourcing to India if that delivers value to shareholders. It will also have the benefit of helping to raise living standards there.

I shall not waste time bombarding the Minister with facts and figures about India's excellent growth in gross domestic product. He knows all about that and probably has even better statistics at his fingertips than I can assemble. The central point is that the growth in India's imports is enormous. Imports are up by a third this year to $63 billion. Even after stripping out the effect of oil, imports into India are currently growing at a rate of 30 per cent. Are UK firms capturing enough of that growth? I believe that they are not.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): My hon. Friend is right that UK firms may not be doing enough to capture growth, but he will remember that when we had the chance to speak to Mr. Nath, the Commerce Minister, on the trip that he describes, we spoke about the liberalisation of both financial markets, and particularly about the need to liberalise the insurance market. I hope that the Minister will take the message that we need to continue to press for that opportunity and to ensure that the Indian Government open up the insurance market further.

Mr. Crabb: I am grateful that my hon. Friend made that point, because I was not going to cover it. We need to consider some of the barriers that need to be taken down on our side when we think about how we expand trade into India.

Our exports to India in the 10 years between 1995 and 2004 were on average less than 5 per cent. a year. One could pick a different year as a baseline and come up with a slightly better or slightly worse figure, but the simple fact is that since India's programme of liberalisation started, our export growth to India has hardly been spectacular. Between 2003 and 2004, it was flat, with an increase in service exports that did not quite cancel out a fall in our goods exports. Our exports to China, the United States and Russia have grown at a much greater rate over the same 10-year period. In fact, our export growth rate in India has been similar to our export rate in the European Union, which is considered to be a sluggish market.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): I joined my hon. Friend on that visit to India and I am pleased to support him in this debate. However, having visited India on many occasions with my previous company, Intellicommunications, I welcome the Government help for new-to-export firms going there. It is just a shame that some of the funding to existing firms has been cut recently.

Mr. Crabb: I understand that as a result of the comprehensive spending review last year, some of the funding for export promotion at UK Trade and Investment was cut. The British Chambers of Commerce has also expressed concern.

Another concern was expressed by David Frost, the director general of the British Chambers of Commerce, in an interview with one of the Minister's departmental publications:

"One real concern is that there is too much focus on Europe . . . Europe is a market that is essentially stagnant. We've got to get where the action is, and at the moment that's on the other side of the globe".

[Mr. Crabb]

He was talking about India, China and the US. The British Chambers of Commerce has been making that point for years and has been trying to draw attention to the huge opportunities in India and the need to move quickly to seize them.

In discussions with UK exporters and individuals connected to UK trade initiatives since returning from India in September, I have come across the concern that exciting action is taking place elsewhere in which we are not sharing fully. I heard that view expressed again at the launch of the Indo-British Partnership Network at Asia house on Monday evening. Could we be doing better? I believe that we could and should be doing a whole lot better.

On Monday evening, the Indian high commissioner said that Britain is a natural partner for India. He mentioned the 250 years of shared history, albeit not a voluntary relationship on the Indian side. There are a number of other factors that mean we should be well placed to take advantage of opportunities in India.

First, we are home to one of the largest components of the Indian diaspora. There are now more than 1.5 million people of Indian extraction here in the United Kingdom, many of whom have built successful enterprises here, not to mention the thousands of Indian students who are achieving impressive results at our top universities and business schools.Secondly, we have a shared language. There are up to 200 million English speakers in India, making it the world's second largest English-speaking nation. Thirdly, India shares values and a political system modelled on our own. The Minister made a very pertinent point on Monday evening. None of those factors necessarily translates into easy and automatic wins for UK exporters, but they provide a solid base from which we can build an advantage.

I am concerned that other countries seem to have woken up far quicker to the huge opportunities in India and are notching up truly impressive increases in their exports there. Australian exports to India, for example, are growing at more than 30 per cent. annually and last year passed 6 billion Australian dollars. If that is converted to sterling, it is not too far behind UK exports; on current trends it may not be very long before Australia overtakes Britain in terms of the value of her exports there.

What has impressed me about the Australian approach is how they identify certain niche areas on which they focus concertedly. The 2010 Commonwealth games in Delhi is an obvious example. Australian firms, with the support of their Government, are seeking to leverage their expertise in providing services and infrastructure for major sporting events, and they have specifically targeted the 2010 Games as a major business opportunity.

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way and for giving the House the opportunity to discuss this important issue involving the nation that is, after all, the eighth biggest inward investor in the UK.

On the point that the hon. Gentleman made concerning Australian preference, does he see any causal linkage between the fact that Australia is now the third most popular country where Indian students study abroad, and the economic success of Australian trade in India?

Mr. Crabb: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. I am aware of the huge increase in tourism between the two countries; Indians visiting Australia and Australians travelling to India and elsewhere around the world. On the back of the Sydney Olympic games in 2000 and the Melbourne Commonwealth games next year, Australian companies have already been successful in picking up contracts in Delhi. That is partly the result of initiatives such as the games linkages programme, which was set up by the state of Victoria to help its firms to exploit opportunities at other major sporting events.

Peter Luff: I agree with what my hon. Friend said about the Commonwealth games, but I want to pick up the point made by, for this purpose if not for every purpose, my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Stephen Pound). My advice is that he should not let the Minister get away too easily with the point about higher education because there is real concern in India that our regime, particularly on visas and the working arrangements attached to those visas, is making the UK less attractive than it should be for Indian students. We need to make progress on that. Australia and the United States of America are overtaking us as attractive locations for students because of the visa working requirements. That is important for long-term trade relations with India.

Mr. Crabb: That is certainly an important contribution. Another example of a country achieving impressive export growth to India is Israel. Bilateral trade between India and Israel has grown by nearly 25 per cent. a year, a level broadly in line with India's overall increase in international trade. Trade with Israel has grown from around $200 million in 1992—a tiny amount—and is projected to reach $2.7 billion this year. The two countries are cementing what seems to be an exciting trading relationship backed up with a clear target set by Kamal Nath, the Commerce Minister, who wants bilateral trade to exceed $5 billion by 2007. India has become Israel's second largest trading partner in Asia in non-military goods and services.

Like India's trade with Belgium, diamonds account for a large proportion of the trade but India and Israel are pursuing interesting and exciting initiatives in telecommunications, biotechnology, nanotechnology and space science, which are areas where there are potentially huge high-value gains in future. Perhaps the Minister will tell us whether his Department is working towards clear targets for increasing Indo-British trade and, if so, what they are.

The United States is India's largest trading partner. Between 2003 and 2004—the year when our exports to India actually fell—US exports increased by 22 per cent. Again, that increase was commensurate with the overall growth in India's international trade.

In conclusion, India's economic growth is one of the central narratives of what is happening in the global economy today. I am concerned because British firms should be at the very forefront in sharing that growth, but they are not. A country such as the United Kingdom, which has the fourth largest GDP and two centuries of trading experience with India, should have bilateral trade with India in 2005 of more than £6.5 billion or £7 billion with the second fastest-growing and 10th largest economy in the world. I look forward to hearing the Minister's thoughts and his response on how we can boost our exports to India.

4.12 pm

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Gale, and I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) on securing the debate. I agree with him about the importance of trade between the UK and India, and acknowledge the close interest that many hon. Members on both sides of the House have in developing and strengthening trade relations with India.

India is the world's second fastest-growing economy and is forecast to become by 2050 the world's third largest economy after the United States and China. It will also become the world's most populous nation. Since economic reform started in 1991, growth rates in India have averaged between 6 and 7 per cent. annually, and growth is now forecast to be about 8 per cent.

The emergence of India as an economic superpower is not in doubt: whether in traditional sectors such as construction, manufacturing and financial services or in emerging areas such as the creative industries, renewable energy and environmental technology, opportunities exist for UK businesses. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government want to ensure that UK companies are well placed to take advantage of India's emergence as an economic superpower, and we are doing that by committing an increased percentage of UK Trade and Investment resources to India.

India is recognised as a priority market in all 16 industry sectors identified by UKTI as being key to the success of the global economy. UKTI has in India the second largest network globally after that of the United States. There are nine trade offices located in the key commercial centres—New Delhi, Mumbai, Chennai, Kolcotta, Puna, Ahmedabad, Bangalore, Hyderabad and Chandagar—and 72 staff carrying out commercial work for UKTI in India. Put simply, the Government are putting their money where their mouth is when it comes to promoting trade with India.

Support for encouraging trade between our two countries is evident at the highest level. In September, along with my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, I visited India for the EU-India and UK-India summits, accompanied by the largest trade delegation seen for a long time. Increased trade was at the top of the agenda during the visit, and we discussed at length more ways of removing some barriers to trade that still exist between the UK and India.

In the insurance and financial services sector, India has a strong desire to increase trade between our two countries, and we are making good progress on joint UK-India initiatives. We are also working towards the challenging objectives set by the Joint Economic Trade Committee. JETCO was set up as part of the UK-India joint declaration made in London by the Prime Ministers of the UK and India on 20 September last year. It is a bilateral trade and investment forum that seeks to maximise the potential for trade and investment in the relationship between our two countries.

Peter Luff: I do not blame the Government for this, and I agree with what the Minister is saying, but does he share my concern that in debate on trade and investment relations between India and this country, India is often considered a threat in some sense, rather than the provider of a huge opportunity for this country.

May I invite the Minister to expand at length on what he said about environmental and renewable energy technologies? As India expands its economy—with the huge challenges to the global environment involved with its use of coal, for example—British companies are well placed to assist with environmentally friendly development.

Ian Pearson: The balance of economic power is shifting to the east—to China, India and Asia more generally—so it is vital that we recognise not only the challenges brought by the growing economies of India and China, but the opportunities. We should not adopt a negative approach to those countries. That is why the Government have been looking to maximise the opportunities for dialogue, and to encourage more and more of our companies to enter those important markets for the future. The hon. Gentleman is right that there are tremendous opportunities for environmental technology as well as for water and other services.

I was about to refer to air services, which is another area in which there has been tremendous progress in the past year. The number of direct flights has tripled, from 16 a week to more than 50. Our objective is an open skies agreement between the UK and India.

In another area, the creative industries, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport signed a film co-production treaty on Monday. That framework will allow UK and Indian film production companies to collaborate on future projects. It is due to come into force around next April.

The Asia Task Force, which is co-chaired by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and Bryan Sanderson, chief executive of Standard Chartered bank, is also up and running. The ATF, which has more than 20 chief executive officers of major UK companies as well as Lord Desai on its board, has already commissioned research on identifying how we can improve the trading environment throughout Asia. A major strand of that research will focus on trade with India.

As the debate has shown, it is not just the Government who should encourage greater bilateral trade with India, as the private sector has an important role to play, too. The extent to which the private sector is beginning to focus on India is encouraging. As I said, during the Prime Minister's visit to Delhi, we were accompanied by a delegation of more than 30 CEOs of British companies, including small and medium-sized enterprises as well as multinationals. They were all keen to increase trade between the UK and India.

The Indo-British Partnership Network, which I formally launched on Monday, as the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire mentioned, will, I am sure, play an important role in helping to encourage UK companies—particularly small and medium-sized businesses—to export their goods and services to India. I hope, too, that it will play a key part in identifying issues that prevent companies from taking advantage of trading with India.

Much has been done, but I accept that more needs to be done. The value of our trade with India accounts for a little less than 1 per cent. of our global total. It can and should be more. Perhaps we should forget predictions. Today, India is the world's 10th largest economy, but it is 17th in the league table of UK export markets. That reinforces my strongly held view that more can be done to increase trade between our two countries. Therefore, I welcome today's debate and the Trade and Industry Committee inquiry on trade and investment opportunities with India. I am glad to see the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), the Chair of the Committee, in the Chamber today, and I hope the inquiry makes policy recommendations that will help us progress to increased trade between the UK and India.

UKTI officials are seeking views on how to improve trade from key stakeholders such as the CBI and the Indo-British Partnership Network. The British high commission in New Delhi is busy strengthening its engagement with the Government of India on business issues. The more we can identify and overcome barriers to trade between the UK and India, the better placed our companies will be to take advantage of the opportunities that come with India's growth and development.

Stephen Hammond: A point about barriers that was made to our small team, which visited the Science Minister—a rather smaller team than that which went out with the Minister a week later—was that UK universities, and particularly chemistry research departments and some new high-technology industries, are at times reluctant to undertake joint developments with Indian universities. The trade potential of those developments is enormous. Will the Minister consider inviting universities to forge greater links with Indian universities?

Ian Pearson: We are keen on greater links between UK academic institutions and Indian universities, although I do not want to decry the good work that has already been done in that respect. For the UK's future, it is vital that our world-class science base and world-class research should network with universities and the scientific community in growing economies. We have, through the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, scientific counsellors in our posts across the world, working on developing such partnerships. I strongly believe that that is to the long-term advantage of UK plc.

While I am on that point, I want to reassure hon. Members that we are looking into the question of student visas and work permits for India, China and other growing economies. We recognise that there is an issue to be dealt with, and our programme includes closely scrutinising it to find out what else we can do to ensure that the UK is competitive in the area in question.

Stephen Pound: As we are talking about science delegations, I should perhaps mention that I was a member of the smallest delegation ever to visit India. It consisted of the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) and me.

On the Minister's point about work permits and visas, is he aware that while it appears to be no problem for UK nationals to get permits to work in India, there are still severe concerns, which I have heard expressed to him in my presence, about the reverse process? Is he prepared to make a commitment today to do all he can within the Government to speed up the process of achieving equality in the area of work permits?

Ian Pearson: I can certainly assure my hon. Friend that we are actively addressing that issue. We recognise that it is important, but there are sensitivities involved and the work involves a number of Departments. However, it is firmly on our agenda, as is work to persuade more companies seriously to consider doing business with India.

Let me share with hon. Members some things that UKTI is doing to address the issue. It is organising a series of workshops and seminars on doing business in India. Those events are taking place across the UK, and they are designed specifically to inform companies of the many opportunities that exist and to provide some practical guidance on avoiding pitfalls. The key objective of the events is to encourage companies to think hard about exporting to India. If UKTI's provisional estimates are correct, more than 1,000 companies will attend those workshops. Therefore, in addition to the work being done through the Indo-British Partnership Network, a vital awareness-raising programme is taking place.

We also need to discourage the still widely held view that trade between the UK and India means little more than outsourcing low-skilled manufacturing jobs and call centres to India. It does not. Let us not forget that the UK benefits greatly from Indian investment. Companies such as Infosys and Tata make a terrific contribution to the UK economy, and India is investing in the UK in the high-tech sectors—60 per cent. of Indian investment is in IT.

Trade between the UK and India is increasing. Half-yearly figures for 2005 show an increase of more than 24 per cent. on the corresponding period in 2004—£3.7 billion for 2005 compared with £2.9 billion for 2004—with trade roughly in balance. I very much welcome the fact that progress is being made. Again, I believe that we can do even better, and we should be aiming to do so. I expect that the number of UKTI-supported trade missions in India will grow next year and the year after, and I can tell the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) that not only new-to-export companies, but companies that are new to the Indian market, will be eligible for UKTI support

Mr. Crabb rose—

Ian Pearson: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I shall continue as there are only a few minutes left. In that time, I want to re-emphasise the importance that the Government attach to doing more business with India.

I shall visit India again next month to attend the Confederation of Indian Industry business summit and the Auto Expo trade fair, and I hope to take with me a delegation of more than 20 business people who are keen and actively engaged in doing business with India. India means business and we need to be serious about doing business with India. It is a market that offers huge potential, and I am keen to develop further and faster our trade relationship with India.

I welcome the interest shown by the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire, who raised this important issue, and I hope we have a great many more debates on how we can further improve trade with India. I am sure we will do that as part of the Trade and Industry Committee inquiry.

Suburban Areas (Funding)

4.30 pm

Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): I am delighted to have secured this debate. First, I should say clearly—I make no apology—that my points are about nothing more or less than hard cash and resources. I am not necessarily arguing that more money should go to regeneration, to facilities for young people, to training or whatever. I believe that this Government have devoted more time, energy and commitment to investing in and revitalising communities than any other. It is a record of which I and they can be proud.

My contention is that areas of the country such as my constituency that do not neatly fit into categories are seen as being unwittingly but systematically discriminated against by the system of allocating funds for regeneration and facilities. This is, to put it crudely, about claiming a fair share of the cake for my constituents in Wirral, South.

My part of the United Kingdom could not be called deprived, either economically or socially. The Guardian, for example, profiles Wirral, South as a classic suburban seat. The definition of a suburb is in strict terms quite simple, and it is "an outlying district of a city, especially a residential one."

If one substitutes the word conurbation for city, we might be said to be a suburb of Birkenhead or Merseyside. However, such a definition is far from adequate. It fails to describe the sheer variety of the landscapes that constitute my constituency, from prosperous residential areas to idyllic villages to leafy and not-so-leafy suburbs and to open countryside. That is part of what makes my job as an MP so enjoyable.

We are all able to identify a suburban area in our mind, but it is harder to put a finger on precisely what it means. That may go some way to explain why parts of areas such as mine tend, in my view, to be neglected. They do not fit neatly into any box. The Joseph Rowntree Foundation has published some excellent pioneering research into the potential problems of suburbia. Some might argue that there are difficulties in defining and clearly marking the boundaries and characteristics of suburban areas, meaning that they are not given the attention that they deserve.

Suburban areas' mixed-use nature may result in a semblance, at least to the instant eye, of stability. However, there may not be a focus. There may be an incomplete sense of community and almost certainly an insufficiency of facilities. For the young that can engender, among other things, a sense of deprivation and boredom. The Joseph Rowntree Foundation's research stands out because it is virtually the only study of its type. Of the 42 pieces of regeneration research conducted by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, at least 30 are concerned specifically with urban areas. There are none on suburban areas.

It is right that areas of deprivation such as parts of Birkenhead and the north of Wirral should receive priority. However, as I shall go on to say, if we are complacent about suburban areas, it will cost more in the long run to sort them out. Simply put, my constituency does not fare well in terms of funding. A plethora of dedicated funds of one sort or another is available and I welcome the Chancellor's pledge in the pre-Budget report to use unclaimed money from bank accounts to fund youth and community programmes. We are short of those.

I am sceptical about whether we shall see any such funds in Wirral, South. At present, for example, we receive nothing from the neighbourhood renewal fund and precious little from the single regeneration budget, or what is left of it, and we are among the lowest recipients of lottery money. We are 569th in the constituency tables for lottery money, which is a considerable improvement on what went before. European money that is directly attributable to my constituency is minimal, we have no new deal for communities and minimal Sure Start. Why is that?

First, there is the culture of the bid. For most funding—thankfully, we are beginning to see exceptions to the rule—following the initial application, an at-length holistic business plan must be submitted to the relevant arbiter, whoever that may be, and that is followed by a review. The end result is that the process is long and tortuous and, in a sense, professional—I shall come to that later—which has consequences for areas such as mine.

The philosophy dates back to when Michael Heseltine was Secretary of State for the Environment in the late 1980s. His big idea was to make the allocation of regeneration moneys competitive. City challenge, as it was principally called, invited local authorities to tender, initially within a six-week period, for a funding pool. A bid required an extremely broad-based partnership, so applicants were required to muster up a coalition of unlikely bedfellows in the name of partnership—then and, to some extent, still the buzzword. Private sector companies, the voluntary sector, councillors, the chief constable, head teachers and others were all thrown together in a sort of Darwinian pact.

The end result was a close co-operation of necessity, but it was almost always short term in its effect because the partnership was brought together for the sake of securing the money. There was no basic solidarity, even if the bid succeeded. If it did not, there was worse to come, as the money for city challenge was not new but top-sliced from existing budgets. Those who lost suffered a double whammy with an appreciable cut in their budgets.

I believe that approach to have been wholly wrong. It was sometimes said that what brought a partnership together was the suppression of mutual loathing in order to get one's hands on the dosh. That was not my phrase. I would not say that myself, of course, but partnerships were formed, in effect, to make a quick buck, and successful bidders certainly enjoyed the spoils of extra cash for regeneration.

As it happens, the Wirral bid was successful. I believe that I am right in saying that more than £37 million came to Wirral as a whole, but next to nothing to Wirral, South. The losers were penalised—sometimes inevitably, as there was insufficient money to go around and good bids lost out. The Department of the Environment's interim report in 1996 praised the scheme overall, but even Heseltine's former Department was able to point to significant weaknesses. An evaluation of the programme states:

> "For some people, it is more problematic as a basis for allocating urban resources in being potentially divisive and penalising areas without conspicuous development opportunities or the capacity to deliver."

As studies in, for example, the academic journal Social Policy and Administration have noted, city challenge had a lasting effect on regeneration policy in this country. In my view, its legacy was not altogether to the good.

The bidding culture has led increasingly to the professionalisation of bidding, to the extent that there are advertisements in the press for lottery and bidding officers whose sole purpose is to maximise the likelihood of successful bids. That is dangerous in that, inevitably, it sucks resources away and means that people on the ground suffer if a bid for moneys is unsuccessful. As I said, the bidding element is no longer as entrenched as it was in all streams, but it and its culture are still there, to the detriment of the United Kingdom generally but particularly constituencies such as mine.

Not only is there the snowball effect of successful bids—one acquires the professionalism of bidding, which is, in a sense, a black art—that allows for successful bids, but money goes to money. Those who are able to bid in one challenge system are already geared up and have the people and professionalism to bid in the next round. Money follows money, and the concentration concentrates on the previous concentration, to the detriment of other areas.

Because of the holistic nature of the bidding approach, a by-product is that other resources naturally gravitate towards the areas that are already provided for in the funding. For example, police and drugs teams, outreach projects and so on will follow the allocated resources—to some extent, to the detriment of other areas. The purpose becomes the bid, not the job that is needed. Money is the driver of what is done. People seek to have projects that can secure funding, rather than those that do what needs to be done. Things are awry.

There are powerful and influential lobbies to speak for different parts of our country. Urban areas have, for example—I am just picking a few organisations at random—the British Urban Regeneration Association, the Urban Forum and the urban resource centre. Rural areas have the power of the National Farmers Union, the Countryside Commission, the Campaign to Protect Rural England and the Countryside Alliance at their disposal. To the best of my knowledge, there is nothing for suburban areas. There is no lobbying voice that speaks coherently and singularly for suburban areas. The ODPM has an urban and rural policy but, to the best of my knowledge, no suburban equivalent. It is left to local people to take the lead and the odds are stacked against them.

Often, as is the case in Wirral, the centre of gravity is with the local authority's physical location—in this case, in Birkenhead. The bulk of the voters are there and so is the bulk of the attention. However, we in Wirral, South also have our problems and they are not trivial. Mostly, but not exclusively, they centre on antisocial behaviour. Every day, my office receives reports of incidents of antisocial behaviour of one form or another. Whether it is gangs of drunken youths roaming the streets, or vandalism, petty theft, smashing bus shelters, breaking car mirrors, entering premises to intimidate, or being abusive, such behaviour happens every week and probably every night.

Some people in the leafy suburbs are afraid to go out; that should not be the case. Some parts of my constituency become, in effect, relative no-go areas on a Saturday night. I hold regular meetings with the police, residents groups and, of course, constituents. Antisocial behaviour happens in some of the most deprived areas, but it also happens in places such as Bebington, Clatterbridge, Bromborough, Eastham and even prosperous Heswall. In a sense, those places represent middle England. Antisocial behaviour has become a major blight and it is the No. 1 issue on the doorstep and in my postbag. We have strategies in place courtesy of the Home Office, but they are not wholly successful.

There are other arguments, although they are part of the same broader problem, and I raised them in Home Office questions on Monday. However, for the purposes of today, I am concerned with the other side of the coin: activities for young people. I am talking about facilities and things to do. It has been shown time and again that those things make a difference in the long run. The entire western half of my constituency currently has no sports and leisure centre. That means that young people are cut off and left to their own devices.

I am not saying that the provision of youth facilities would be a panacea. One can argue about the causes of antisocial behaviour, particularly in young people. It is obviously related to a multitude of things: parenting, truancy, education, the ready availability of alcohol, police presence, our culture and so on. We have the stick of antisocial behaviour orders, section 32 powers and so on, but the carrot is insufficient, particularly in areas such as mine. Time and again, resources are diverted away, wittingly or unwittingly. The toss can be argued and I have no doubt that those administering the funds would be able to put up a robust defence, but I find it hard to square the myriad objective tests with the evidence, which I see every week as a constituency MP, of problems and to some extent stagnation in parts of Wirral, South.

A case in point is one of my local areas: New Ferry. Businesses there find it hard to survive and some shut soon after they are opened. Despite the commendable work of the New Ferry regeneration action group, the place is starved of investment and resources and there needs to be an overall review. I cannot think of a better candidate for a rounded regeneration initiative, yet it is largely passed over and even the measures that are in train—the Wirral waterfront and Winstanley road home zone areas—are simply not enough in themselves. They help and I welcome them, but they are not enough.

The contrast in my constituency is immense. The index of multiple deprivation shows Heswall to be in the top 25 per cent. in terms of the least deprived in the UK. New Ferry is in the bottom 6 per cent. However, the devil is in the detail. New Ferry is a relatively small area and it is surrounded by more prosperous areas, not least Port Sunlight village. I accept that that is not greatly prosperous, but it is more prosperous. It is not a place of milk and honey, but it is slightly more prosperous than New Ferry. We missed out in the first round of the neighbourhood renewal fund because the objective measure took place at ward level, and New Ferry is in Bromborough, which, as a ward, is not classified as deprived, although, of course, it has its needs.

I am aware that the ODPM started to employ data that are now to be at sub-ward level and to be called super output areas. They can detect small pockets of deprivation; indeed, they identified New Ferry as such. I understand that SOAs will be used as a mechanism to deliver funds from April next year, but again we miss out because the cut-off point is 3 per cent.—the 3 per cent. most deprived wards, as a recently parliamentary answer informed me. The cut-off point was locally prescribed, but does the Minister consider it right that areas well within the 10 per cent. criterion for allocation of NRF money to local authorities receive nothing from a total next year of more than £6 million?

Will that cut-off point be maintained after April? Will it be the 3 per cent. most deprived SOAs? Does the Minister consider it right or fair for the wards in Wirral that will continue to receive targeted NRF help to contain several SOAs with lower—some not inconsiderably so—levels of deprivation? I am not sure that, if the SOA measures are to be used effectively, there is not a need to reconsider. I hope that the Minister will not consider it unreasonable of me to draw attention to what I and my constituents consider to be systematic discrimination against suburban areas, pockets and strands of deprivation.

I am careful not to overstate my case, but if the totality is thrown at today's problem areas, the areas that are now non-problem areas will become the problem areas of the future. We must maintain an appropriate balance. If action is not taken to at least nurture our more suburban areas, they will inevitably decline over time. Already, they suffer from a lack of facilities. In some respects, we are already there. With councils under more pressure to rein in their spending, from which my local authority is far from immune, not least in social services, it is more important than ever to ensure that various tiers of funding are allocated on the basis of need, which takes different forms.

Welcome though it is and an increase in real terms, Wirral's local government settlement, when rounded in all respects, comes out at about 2.6 per cent. this year. However, it is lower than the national average. It is tight. We need to think at both constituency and at Wirral level about how we allocate the scarce funds and the need to allocate them fairly. At present, it is my contention that areas such as mine are not receiving a fair allocation.

4.48 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Ben Chapman) on securing the debate, which introduces a matter that is important to his constituents and to influencing Government policy throughout the country. He said that urban and rural areas have powerful and influential advocates; his constituents have a powerful and influential advocate in him. He is well respected and well known for standing up for them, as he has done again today. I can bring him some good news, at least by reassuring him that the central points of his argument are being acknowledged by the Government in many respects.

[Mr. Phil Woolas]

My hon. Friend understandably referred to the revenue support grant settlement for 2006–07 and 2007–08, which was announced yesterday, of 2.6 and 2.7 per cent. We have also announced today the education schools budget allocation, and I am delighted to inform him that the allocation for schools in his area will be increased by nearly £12 million—nearly 7.5 per cent. I am sure he welcomes that.

The available data are now so sophisticated that we can, as my hon. Friend has, identify pockets of poverty—as he was about to say, the nattily titled super output areas. I have a map here, but unfortunately I am colour blind, so I cannot see the exact allocation. However, his constituency clearly has areas of poverty, which, were they in the neighbouring administrative area, would be entitled to funds that they perhaps do not receive now. The point that he makes is important not just for his constituents, but for the whole country. It is true that Government policy has been targeted on areas of deprivation, and he asks whether special attention should be paid to the suburbs.

It may be helpful if I outline Government policy. Over the past three years, we have worked with local government on possible changes to grant distribution formulae. We consulted publicly over the summer and drew conclusions that have been placed in the Library as well as—we are a modern Department—on our website for all to see. A key message about that settlement, and about funding for suburban areas and pockets of deprivation in the relatively prosperous suburbs, is that it is a matter for the main programme funding of the local agencies, such as the local authorities, the national health service and the police.

My hon. Friend referred to the SOA data, which are more sophisticated data than were available in the past. They give us a more detailed understanding of patterns of deprivation in England, which helps us to ensure that funding is targeted where it is most needed. The index of deprivation for 2004 provided data by SOA. Because those criteria were used when calculating the neighbourhood renewal fund, allocations for 2006–2008—the two years that I confirmed yesterday—and in relation to deciding which areas should get the neighbourhood renewal element of safer stronger communities funding have been made available.

We believe that the SOAs—the indices on pockets of deprivation—provide local strategic partnerships with the opportunity better to pinpoint deprived areas. Local partners in the public, private and voluntary sectors are therefore able to target their policies and funding more effectively. My hon. Friend's council, Wirral, and its partners should therefore decide how best to spend the overall annual budgets to meet the needs of all Wirral's residents, including his own, using the evidence that is now available. In addition to the mainstream funding that Wirral receives, the Government have provided extra support for pockets of deprivation, as I said, through the NRF and the safer stronger communities fund.

Wirral has deprived wards, so it has been allocated more than £5 million of NRF resources for the current financial year. It has also had an indicative allocation for the next two years of £6.5 million for 2006–07 and £7.5 million for 2007–08. Therefore, from 2001 to 2008, Wirral will receive nearly £36 million of NRF funding.

The purpose of that funding is to provide local support to local authorities in the most deprived districts to enable them, in collaboration with their other partners in the public sector and beyond, to improve services. That contributes to the achievement of Government targets and—I emphasise this point to help my hon. Friend—local targets to narrow the gap between deprived areas and the rest of the country.

To do that, the neighbourhood renewal programme, agreed by the Wirral council strategic partnership, provides support to the most deprived wards of the area—all of which are among the 3 per cent. of the most deprived wards in England. That is the crucial point that my hon. Friend made.

This is a local decision. The local strategic partnership is free to use its local knowledge and to spend those resources in any way that helps to meet the key national and local targets. The funding is already being used on a wide range of projects—for example, to target antisocial behaviour. In Wirral, the LSP is already providing more than £354,000 to fund warden initiatives across the borough as part of its strategy. There is also a neighbourhood management pathfinder scheme in Tranmere. I hope that Wirral, like other areas, will employ neighbourhood management principles to ensure that services are more responsive to the needs of residents.

Cutting to the chase, my hon. Friend rightly identified the fact that the safer and stronger communities funding was allocated by focusing on the 3 per cent. most deprived SOAs using the 2004 indices of deprivation, so small pockets of deprivation are targeted with additional funding. That is to ensure that funding is not spread too thinly. However, Wirral is getting one allocation of the neighbourhood element of safer stronger communities money, which is worth £1.6 million over four years. It is for local partners to agree how and where the money will be spent and which SOAs in their area will be covered.

The new allocations complement each other; many small pockets of deprivation outside NRF areas are being targeted by the neighbourhood element of the safer stronger communities fund. In total, 108 local authority areas will be targeted by one fund or by both. That means that the new resources will reach more than 93 per cent. of the people living in the 10 per cent. most deprived areas. Therefore, only a small number of small pockets of deprivation are not targeted by my Department in any way. Where pockets of deprivation fall outside those funding streams, it is for local authorities and their partners to support them using their own resources.

On top of the NRF and the SSCF, European objective 1 funding is available for the whole Merseyside region. Within that, an allocation of resources is aimed at tackling issues of deprivation in specific areas due to their classification as being among the most deprived areas of Merseyside. Three of those areas fall within Wirral, South. Single regeneration funding is available to support Wirral, South businesses.

Wirral is therefore in a good position to bring together funding streams from central Government to ensure better outcomes for people and improved public services through their local area agreement. As my hon. Friend is aware, Wirral is a round 2 local area agreement body and is negotiating that agreement ready for sign-off and delivery in April 2006.

The new area agreements are a new contract between central Government and local government. LSPs are free to use their local knowledge and spend these resources in any way that helps to meet key national and local targets for reducing deprivation. It is crucial that Wirral local authority and its partners continue to target mainstream funding to support areas of deprivation, including my hon. Friend's constituency.

Question put and agreed to.

Terrorism (Foreign Policy Aspects)

[Relevant documents: Sixth Report from the Foreign Affairs Committee, Session 2004–05, HC 36 and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6590.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Kevin Brennan.]

2.30 pm

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): As this is the last time that I shall chair a sitting of Westminster Hall before Christmas, I should like to wish all hon. Members a happy, prosperous, successful and restful break. I call the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): Thank you, Sir Nicholas. May I begin by wishing you and all the staff of the House a happy Christmas and peaceful and prosperous new year?

I should like to refer to the report that was published in March just before the general election. It was the last report published by the Select Committee in the previous Parliament. It is a comprehensive report and it covers a wide area. In my introduction, I will not be able to go into all the areas in great detail, but I see that a number of colleagues from the Committee are here. I am sure that they will supplement, or even contradict, what I might say on some aspects, and they may refer to the parts that I do not touch on.

There has been no let-up in terrorism internationally since the report was published. We know, sadly, from the events of 7 July in London and then 21 July that our country is now seriously threatened by radical terrorist groups. Fifty-two people were killed in London on 7 July; 700 were injured, many of whom are still recovering from their injuries and from the psychological impact of those bombs. As a London Member of Parliament, I have to say that the way in which Londoners responded—their resilience and calmness—was a tribute to this great city.

Two weeks later on 21 July there were four more bombs, possibly copycat. Nobody really knows. Fortunately they failed to explode. Therefore we in London saw what many others have suffered at the hands of radical Islamist terrorist groups. On 23 July, two car bombs and a bomb placed in a suitcase exploded in the Egyptian tourist resort of Sharm al-Sheikh and 88 people were killed, including 11 British tourists. On 1 October, three suicide bombers killed at least 23 people and injured around 150 others in Bali in Indonesia. Just a few days ago on 5 December, a Palestinian Islamic jihad suicide bomber blew himself up in a line of shoppers in the Israeli seaside town of Netanya and killed five other people.

Since the destruction of its bases in Afghanistan, al-Qaeda has become much more dispersed and decentralised. It is perhaps no longer appropriate to talk of al-Qaeda in the sense of one organisation. There are local franchises operating independently in many parts of the world. The al-Qaeda leadership, as such, is not necessarily in charge or control of, or even in regular contact with, those groups. The dispersal and break-up of al-Qaeda does not mean that the threat has been reduced. On the contrary, as the Committee has heard in recent evidence sessions, the threat may be much more difficult to cope with. We have heard from many witnesses about the shift towards home-grown cells, which has made it more difficult to prevent terrorist attacks. Attacks have been carried out by groups about which there was, from what I have been told, no intelligence beforehand. Moreover, because of the use of the internet, the terrorist organisations and terrorist cells may now no longer be travelling to terrorist training camps, but are getting the information in their home or neighbouring countries from other sources.

The international community has not done enough to counter the internet and the use of the internet, not just for terrorist training purposes, but for propaganda by terrorist organisations. Our Committee has heard that there has been a serious failure in counter-propaganda and in public diplomacy. One of the difficulties that we confront is the perception, in large parts of the Arab and Muslim world, that there are double standards. Countering that perception is not made any easier when there are well publicised and well reported cases of abuse of prisoners at Abu Ghraib, or torture, or pictures of people at Guantanamo Bay, which are, in a sense, propaganda victories for terrorist organisations and those who speak for them.

The BBC has recently decided to restore, after a 10-year gap, a dedicated Arabic television service, paid for in part by reducing some of the European and other radio services. Our Committee pointed out in our report in July 2004 that the proposal for a BBC Arabic television service had not received additional funding in the Treasury spending review. Consequently, the decision has had to be pushed through at the cost of other BBC services. We have taken evidence on that matter recently and will no doubt return to it in another report.

The BBC has a clear and important role in trying to counter the propaganda of those who justify and excuse terrorist organisations, but it is independent of our Government and must remain so. I hope that it will gain a significant viewing within the Arab world, so that it is not just al-Jazeera and similar channels that are broadcast throughout those countries.

I shall say a little about the issue that has received so much publicity this week: extraordinary rendition. Perhaps my colleagues will also speak about that matter later in the debate. Extraordinary rendition was confirmed by Condoleezza Rice, the United States Secretary of State, as being a policy pursued by the US Government. She said:

"Rendition is a vital tool in combating trans-national terrorism. Its use is not unique to the United States, or to the current administration."

However, she went on to say that "the United States does not permit, tolerate or condone torture under any circumstances."

The US Administration seem to believe that that statement and associated statements that they will not transport people from one country or another for the purpose of interrogation under torture will be sufficient to prevent further outcry internationally. I do not believe that that will be the case. I think that there are still many unanswered questions based on the so far unsubstantiated allegations that were made over the past few weeks. It is clear that hundreds of flights are taking place across the world by US aircraft associated with the Central Intelligence Agency. They carry we know not whom—or why; we do not necessarily know where. Questions are being asked in several different countries.

There was an interesting exchange when the new German Chancellor, Angela Merkel, raised the matter with the US Secretary of State. There are reports of a man called Khaled el-Masri, a German national who claims that he was kidnapped in Macedonia, imprisoned in Afghanistan and released five months later in Albania. He is suing the former director of the CIA, George Tenet.

There are worrying indications of the impact of the policy. The Foreign Secretary, holding the presidency of the Foreign Ministers Council, wrote on behalf of the European Union to ask the US Administration to respond to the press reports, and it would be helpful if the Government would make further requests about aspects of the matter directly relevant to this country, and not simply in general terms.

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way on this important and topical issue. Will he comment on the statement made by the Prime Minister in the Chamber about paragraph 97 of the report, giving details of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's view of extraordinary rendition, as compared to the information that was given to the whole House in response to a question from the leader of the Liberal Democrats at Prime Minister's question time on Wednesday?

Mike Gapes: I have no further information than the hon. Gentleman about what was said in the House. All that I would say is that I have no evidence to challenge the Prime Minister's assertion that this country is not engaged in torture, and condemns it. The question is what is happening with respect to the United States and its flights around the world. It has been reported that there are so-called black sites in Poland and Romania—prisons or detention centres, which may or may not now be closed, but which at some point have perhaps been places where people were kept for some time before being moved to another United States facility elsewhere.

It is worrying that those issues have become so prominent and—to return to my earlier point—have become part of the debate about standards, double standards and the image of the democratic world in the context of the war on terrorism. It is not justifiable or excusable and it is also politically foolish for us to use measures that imply that our standards have changed so as to infringe human rights and break international law in the pursuit of the cause of protecting our people from terrorism.

I do not want to comment now on the important judgment by the Law Lords today, but it puts the discussion into context. I hope that when the Government consider the matter internationally and make representations to the United States, they will recognise that we can be damaged and tainted by association with the activities even if we do not participate in them. The need for clarity in our position and our response to what is happening is very important.

I shall deal briefly with the situation in Iraq. The report that we published in March refers to Iraq in considerable detail. The Committee has closely followed developments there. We note that violence continues to be a serious problem in some, but not all, parts of Iraq. The north of the country is relatively peaceful, and the democratic autonomous region there has thrived for many years, both before and since the intervention in 2003. The south of the country around Basra, which is where the British forces are, was much more peaceful and less violent until recent months in which there have been some unfortunate developments and problems. We gave detailed consideration to these matters in the report, but since then there has been the very important development in Iraq of the constitutional referendum and the preparations that are now well under way for the elections on 15 December.

I supported the intervention in Iraq, as did many other Members. Some of my colleagues took a different view, but whatever our position, I believe that we all want there to be a successful outcome to those elections and all parts of Iraq society, including the substantial body of Sunni political figures who so far have not engaged directly in the political process, to be involved in the process in the coming months so that the next Iraqi Government to be formed after the elections can unite all the communities in the country so far as possible.

That will not be easy, because there are still massive stockpiles of former Ba'athist weaponry, many people with the ability to use those weapons and people with an agenda who are determined to destroy the progress towards democracy and stability in the country.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): In paragraph 27 of the report, the Select Committee makes clear its conclusion when it states:

"Iraq is providing a dangerous training ground for terrorists similar to that previously provided by Afghanistan."

Does the hon. Gentleman believe that Her Majesty's Government are doing enough to dissuade Iranian and Syrian involvement in the insurgency in Iraq?

Mike Gapes: I was about to say that opposition to stability and the democratic processes in Iraq comes not only from elements of the former Ba'athist regime. I have seen the work that our forces have been doing in the south of Iraq, and I believe that our Government have been doing a very important job. I also know that great diplomatic efforts have been made to talk particularly to the Iranians about their activities in southern Iraq. It is clear from the events of recent months that there has been a big problem, as there is evidence that Iranian-backed groups have been involved in activities designed to attack British and other coalition forces in southern Iraq.

Suggestions have been made that Iranian militant groups are linked to factions in the Iraqi police force. There was an incident on 19 September in which members of our military—I believe that they were special forces; at least, that is what has been reported in the press—were detained by Iraqis and had to be freed by military intervention. That led to a very serious incident and a deterioration in relations in Basra at the time, and followed a period in which it was clear that British Army convoys had been attacked by roadside bombs with shaped charges that could punch through the vehicles' armour. It was clear that the incident was linked directly to Iran or to Hezbollah-trained people linked to Iran. We must take that grave matter seriously for the future.

The Iraqi police and the Iraqi defence forces are not yet strong enough to provide security even after the democratic elections next year. They will need assistance from the international community for some considerable time. I am sure that when the Committee considers Iraq in coming months, we will comment on those matters in detail.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): We disagrée on the invasion, but I am sure that we agree on its antecedents. I have been seriously underwhelmed by the response of most people in this country to the Volker report. That is an important document, which has huge implications across the world for those who were bailing out the Ba'athist regime, including British companies and individuals. Is the Select Committee likely to examine the Volker report and to consider what can be learned from it?

Mike Gapes: We have no plans to do so, but I will bear my hon. Friend's suggestion in mind. I will discuss that matter with my colleagues in due course.

Syria is another factor in the instability of Iraq. Syria is not just associated with incursions by terrorists and insurrectionists who enter Iraq, but has known links with some of the more radical rejectionist Palestinian terrorist groups. It is quite clear that the Syrian regime could do much more to reduce terrorism, not just on its borders, but throughout the region. The Syrian regime of Bashar al-Assad has come under international criticism and scrutiny, not least due to United Nations Security Council resolutions and its links with the assassination of the former Lebanese Prime Minister Hariri. It is time for the international community to tell Syria that its behaviour is not acceptable and that it must change.

The Guardian reported today that Syria wishes to reopen negotiations with Israel about the withdrawal from Golan. The international community can assist with that, but only if Syria begins to behave as though it were a constructive member of the international community, not least with regard to the incursions and insurrection in Iraq.

The Committee's report addresses a number of countries in north Africa and the Maghreb and the importance not just of economic links, but of poverty and the migration of peoples across the Mediterranean. Some of the more extreme terrorist organisations from that region have been involved in activities in western Europe. It is important to recognise that the politics of that region has historically fed the development of extremist and terrorist groups. Democratic change and processes are not easy to develop and there is more than one model. Nevertheless, changes are taking place in north Africa. There have been moves towards democracy in a number of countries, which all hon. Members will welcome as a means to create greater stability, political transformation and economic benefit to the people of Africa.

Mr. Drew: Will my hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mike Gapes: No. I am short of time, and I wish to say something about Israel, the west bank and Gaza before I conclude. I am conscious that many hon. Members wish to speak so I do not wish to take any more interventions at the moment.

Last week, some Foreign Affairs Committee members visited Israel, Gaza and the west bank, while other members visited Saudi Arabia and the Emirates. I have no doubt that other hon. Members will comment on that. I wish to highlight the massive political changes that have taken place. Israel has been hit by something of a political earthquake in the last three weeks. First, we saw 82-year-old Nobel prize-winner Shimon Peres replaced as leader of the Labour party by radical left-wing trade union leader Amir Peretz. Secondly, Ariel Sharon withdrew from Likud, taking 14 Likud MPs with him to form a new centre party, Kadima, with three Labour MPs. Following that, Mr. Peres announced that he was leaving Labour after 60 years to support Mr. Sharon, although not to join his party. That political realignment is of enormous significance.

There will be Palestinian elections to the legislative council on 25 January. The Israelis have elections planned for 28 March, which will clearly be greatly influenced by what happens beforehand in the Palestinian process. In virtually all the primaries for the Fatah candidates, radical people associated with the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade are topping the polls. In Jenin, Nablus, Ramallah—where Marwan Barghouti got 96 per cent. of the vote—and East Jerusalem, the younger guard of more radical people, who are not necessarily supported by or closely associated with Abu Mazen and the older leadership, is winning support. In Gaza, Hamas is very strong. The primaries for Fatah candidates were cancelled because of fighting between different Fatah factions, but Hamas is expected to get between 25 and 30 per cent. of the vote and could win a majority. Israel says that it will not negotiate with a Palestinian Government including Hamas.

The question is where will we be in the future? I had not been in the west bank, Gaza or Israel for several years and I had not seen the separation fence—the barrier, the wall—but my perception is that Ariel Sharon is not the man who will negotiate a final status agreement with the Palestinians. Following the unilateral disengagement from Gaza, he is set on unilaterally defining the borders of the Jewish state. My perception, from discussions with Israelis and Palestinians last week, is that he will withdraw from areas east of the separation barrier and abandon the settlements there, as happened in Gaza. He will then consolidate behind the settlement blocks to the east of Jerusalem that are inside the fence—the wall, the barrier. He will consolidate the state, based on greater Jerusalem and a significant percentage—perhaps 7 or 8 per cent.—of the west bank, which will include 74 per cent. of the settlers.

[Mike Gapes]

As a result, Palestinians in East Jerusalem will be enclosed within the wall. Palestinians in the west bank will be separated from their families and their places of work outside the wall. A few years ago, 150,000 people from the Palestinian territories worked in Israel, but the figure is now a few thousand, and the position of the Israeli Government is that no Palestinians will be working there by 2008. That will cause huge economic problems and add to the effects, which we saw, of the road blocks, the closures and the security measures that cover vast areas of the west bank.

We were told—I say this as someone who has always supported the two-states position and always believed that the Israelis have a right to defend themselves from attack and suicide terror—that it used to take one hour to travel by road from Hebron in the south to Ramallah, north of Jerusalem; it now takes an average of three hours. The disruption caused by the conflict, the self-imposed folly of the second intifada and its consequences, and the reaction of the Israelis, who have destroyed so many economic and political possibilities, have lead to great poverty and hardship among Palestinians. We are seeing a consequence of that in a cycle of radicalisation among Palestinians.

My message, having been there last week, is not a very optimistic one for those of us who believe in negotiation, dialogue and processes. However, one state cannot impose a two-state solution. Unilateralism is not enough, and at some point, with the engagement of the US Secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice, who played such an important role in getting the Rafah border crossing agreement, the American Administration must get far more engaged with the support of the European Union, the Russians, the UN, and the rest of the Quartet, to work for a comprehensive two-state solution in the middle east.

I should like to conclude my introduction of the report. We covered other areas, such as Afghanistan, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and other matters, but in the time available, it is clearly not possible to go into detail about all of those. I look forward to the Minister's response.

3.1 pm

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling) (Con): Like the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes), I welcome the opportunity to debate the report, which I hope the House found helpful. We members of the Committee believe that it is an important and significant report, which we published as Parliament was about to be dissolved for the general election. I intend to focus on two issues, both of which were extensively covered in the report—first, the non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and secondly, the all-important issue of Israel and Palestine.

Starting with the non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, I confess to some reluctance at having to quote from the Prime Minister's speech on 18 March 2003, which is now somewhat discredited. It was the speech that he made to persuade the House of Commons to agree to the invasion of Iraq. However, a section of it was profoundly important, although it was used in a wholly incorrect context as a justification for the invasion of Iraq. The Prime Minister referred to two key threats—weapons of mass destruction and terrorism. He made the key point that if those two threats should come together, the seriousness for all countries around the world, including the United Kingdom, would be great. He said:

"The possibility of the two coming together—of terrorist groups in possession of weapons of mass destruction or even of a so-called dirty radiological bomb—is now, in my judgment, a real and present danger to Britain and to its national security."—[Official Report, 18 March 2003; Vol.401, c. 768.]

The Prime Minister referred to what he said as a possibility, which now, nearly three years later, has become a reality. There is little doubt, judging from comments made by senior police officers, that it is not a matter of if but when there is some form of attempted WMD attack on the United Kingdom and other countries. In addition to what has appeared from public sources, it seems to me that we are now into the reality of an era when terrorist groups, as yet unknown and unidentified to security agencies around the world, are working in unknown locations and seeking to put together some form of weapon of mass destruction.

The hon. Member for Ilford, South spoke about the importance of the internet. I wholly agree with him. I was certainly struck by the report that appeared in The Sunday Times on 6 November, which stated:

"An Al-Qaeda website containing detailed instructions in Arabic on how to make nuclear, 'dirty' and biological bombs has attracted more than 57,000 hits and hundreds of readers' inquiries."

"The manual, posted on October 6 on a forum titled Al-Firdaws, or Paradise, contains 80 pages of instructions and pictures of kitchen bomb-making techniques."

The report then referred to comments made by Mr. John Hassard, a physicist at Imperial College, London, who was quoted as saying:

"Normally you just get generic principles, but this appears to be more like a proper instruction manual".

The seriousness of what is available on the internet cannot be underestimated.

As well as what is available on the internet, we say in our report that we are all too familiar with the fact that ready-made WMD are already available throughout the world, not least in Russia, where huge quantities remain of the former Soviet stockpile. We refer to the stockpile in Schuch'ye in Russia, where nearly 2 million active chemical shells are apparently stacked together on wooden racks. They contain sarin, soman and VX, and they are held under what has to be described as somewhat questionable security. That is the biggest chemical weapons stockpile in the world—there are something like 40,000 tonnes of chemical agent—yet a minute fraction of that represents a fatal dose.

It can be said with certainty that if by any appalling chance a terrorist group was able to release a weapon of mass destruction, the casualty toll would utterly and totally dwarf any terrorist attack that used conventional devices. It would totally dwarf the casualty toll of 9/11 and probably dwarf the casualty toll of the worst natural disasters that the world has experienced. I shall not mince my words. Many victims will suffer an extremely painful death and some will suffer an extremely protracted death. That is the reality of what we face.

Having reread the Government's response on that issue, I put it to the Minister that there cannot be a more serious and significant element to the Government's security and defence policy than the protection of the people of this country against some form of WMD attack by terrorists. That must be their single greatest priority.

I worry and I am truly concerned as to whether the Government are giving sufficient priority to resources and planning. Are they making available sufficient finance and the necessary training to give the intelligence services the human resources to deal with the problem? Are they making sufficient money available to provide us with the technical resources to anticipate and pre-empt the problem, and are they doing sufficient to galvanise other countries into playing a more proactive role before the worst happens? The issue needs to go substantially up the Government's priority list, and I urge the Minister to do that.

I come now to Israel and Palestine. I do not believe that if the Israeli-Palestine conflict were settled tomorrow that would be the end of militant Islamic terrorism. Regrettably, a small minority are happy to use the Israel-Palestine position as a justification for terrorism that is totally spurious, because nothing ever justifies terrorism. I believe that if there was a final status settlement tomorrow, some would continue their baleful and appalling efforts to destroy people not merely in the non-Muslim world but in the Muslim world that is representative of regimes or traditions with which they are in disagreement. However, if we could achieve a settlement in the Israeli-Palestine conflict, it would at least remove from millions of people their sense of grievance and their feeling that there was something on which they had to take a vengeful attitude towards the non-Muslim world.

The Government appear to be dealing with policies of illusion when dealing with the Israeli-Palestinian position, and not with the realities on the ground that we had the benefit of seeing last week. Those policies are to establish an independent Palestinian state and to produce a final settlement, which would have to be equally and fairly negotiated. We spoke to many people in Israel and Palestine, and I take exactly the same view as the hon. Member for Ilford, South. With one exception, not one of those to whom I spoke—not only Palestinians but Israelis—held out any prospect of an agreed final status settlement. Unanimously, apart from that one exception, they said that all that would happen would be the unilateral imposition of a settlement on the Palestinians by the Israelis. The exception was a professor in conflict management, an Israeli gentleman of a particular dogmatic view. He said that there could be a final settlement, but in a generation's time—30 years.

When the Government talk bravely about being on track on the road map and moving towards a final status agreement, that is out of synchronisation with anything and everything that we heard in Israel and Palestine last week. We are not even on the road map as far as the political negotiations are concerned. We are merely on a continuation of the unilateral settlement policy, the imposition of a settlement by the Israelis on the Palestinians. That will be a settlement, as the hon. Member for Ilford, South indicated, which incorporates East Jerusalem into the state of Israel, which runs broadly down the line of the wall and separation barrier, and which brings about a substantial de facto annexation of a significant area of the west bank including key water resources.

The second policy of illusion that I believe that the Government are dealing with concerns the second leg of the policy commitment, which is not merely to create a two-state solution and an independent Palestinian state but to create a viable Palestinian state. Are we on the road to a viable Palestinian state? On all the evidence last week, we are moving further and further away from the possibility of the emergence of a viable Palestinian state.

What are the criteria for a viable state? First, a state has to have a capital. Of course, capitals can be created on greenfield sites, but that will not be accepted in that part of the world. Every Palestinian man, woman and child will say that what is absolutely non-negotiable under any circumstances is having East Jerusalem as the capital of an independent Palestinian state. East Jerusalem of course contains within it the third most important mosque in the Muslim world after Medina and Mecca.

It is desirable for an independent and viable state to have a contiguous boundary. That did not happen with East and West Pakistan, but it does happen with most other countries around the world. That is not a geographical possibility with Palestine, because it is of course separated between Gaza and the west bank. The discussions on the connection between Gaza and the west bank are therefore all-important.

We had a fascinating and revealing briefing from the Wolfensohn team, which was charged with the feasibility study report to the Quartet on the connection between Gaza and the west bank. They told us that the Israelis wanted the connection to be solely by rail—a very limited form of connection, which is clearly profoundly unsatisfactory to the Palestinians. The Palestinians want the connection to be by road, which is clearly critical to the viability of a new Palestinian state. And, incredibly—we heard this with disbelief—the Israelis asked for a third option to be considered, which is a road tunnel between Gaza and the west bank, under the state of Israel. It would be the longest road tunnel in the world, if it were built, and would be constructed at fantastic cost. Its aim, presumably, would be to try to keep the Palestinians from travelling on the surface of the Israeli state. I hope that the Minister will be able to assure us in his reply that the British Government will have no truck with the proposal for the only connection between Gaza and the west bank to be by tunnel. I hope that they will press for a road.

In addition to the issue of the contiguous boundary, there is the open question of whether the Israelis' long-term ambition will keep the west bank as a single, contiguous entity. The hon. Member for Ilford, South discounted the possibility of any part of the west bank that is to the east of the barrier and the wall being incorporated at a future point into the state of Israel. I would not wholly rule that out, because there are two land fingers that now point eastwards across the west bank—the Ariel finger and the Ma'ale Adumim finger—and some believe that the long-term plans are to move those fingers still further eastwards, possibly right across to the Jordanian border, which would provide a division of the west bank itself.

The final, crucial requirement is that the Palestinian state is economically viable. The degree of disruption to the lives of individuals and those who are trying to generate income, employment and business opportunities on the west bank has to be seen to be believed. I will not, Sir Nicholas, wave it around now, but I have the United Nations map which shows the position in August. It shows that throughout the west bank there is a combination of permanently manned checkpoints, partially manned checkpoints, gates through the barrier that are manned by soldiers and roads closed with concrete blocks, earth mounds, earth walls or trenches. The map shows every single one.

How many were there? There were 376 checkpoints and closures on the west bank in August 2005 in a pocket-sized territorial area. What an impediment to anyone trying to run a business. How can people run a business when they cannot be certain when their employees will arrive at work? We heard from the British Council that at one point staff were having to go on donkeys through back routes to get to the British Council offices in Ramallah. How can people run an efficient business if, when they export goods to Israel, at the freight crossings they must solemnly take every single item out of their Palestinian number-plated lorry and transfer them by forklift truck into an Israeli number-plated lorry because only Israeli number-plated lorries can go into Israel?

How can people farm viably when their village is separated, as we saw in Jayyus, by the barrier from the land they are trying to farm and they cannot be certain whether they will get through and whether their goods will be held up at the barrier in turn? How can people do anything when their lives are ruled by whether they can get permits to visit their town, to visit Gaza, East Jerusalem or the west bank or even, for farmers, to go on their own land, for example? We were told by the Jayyus farming community that some farmers had been refused permits. As a result, unbelievably, of the application of old Turkish law, coupled with, we were horrified to hear, old British mandate law, if an area is not farmed for a period it can be automatically confiscated into the state of Israel.

That is the way in which the viability of the Palestinian state is week by week, month by month, year by year being set backwards and possibly made a hopeless task. This is all done in the name of security. That security justification is in part valid. Israel faces a continuing appalling threat from suicide bombers. We saw yet another suicide bomb attack just a couple of days ago. The security justification only washes in part. Anyone who has seen the barrier on the ground will know that the line of the barrier is so wide that the only logic of the barrier is to create further land for expansion of the existing settlements.

The Government have to deal with the realities of what is happening on the west bank and in Gaza. I do not believe that they have begun to do so. The prospect of a road map settlement is diminishing. The well-nigh certainty of unilateral annexation is increasing and the prospect of a viable Palestinian state is diminishing by the week, month and year.

3.25 pm

Mr. Greg Pope (Hyndburn) (Lab): I am pleased to follow my two Foreign Affairs Committee colleagues. Like them, I want to focus on the middle east, because the failure to find a lasting and just solution in that region affects the security of us all. The perpetrators of every atrocity since 9/11 have cited the failure to find a just solution to the problems of the middle east as a justification for their outrages. One does not have to accept the warped logic of the terrorist to see that that failure has created a culture in which terrorism and those who support it flourish—and failure there has, indeed, been.

I was in the west bank two years ago with the Foreign Affairs Committee, and we could see the tangible signs of failure. I went to a Palestinian town called Qalqilia in the northern west bank, very close to the Israeli border. The Israeli security wall entirely encircles that town, completely cutting it off from neighbouring towns and villages. It is a sizeable town of 20,000 or 30,000 people, but there is only one way in and one way out—through the checkpoint—and it takes hours to gain access to the town and hours to leave it.

I met a farmer whose land was outside the town wall and whose home was inside it. He was sleeping in the fields, because he could not get through the checkpoint—it would have taken too long. We saw children whose homes were on one side of the wall and whose school was on the other. It was clear to members of all political parties who were on the visit that the town was slowly but surely being strangled by the combination of the wall and the fence that completely encircled it.

When we went back to the west bank last week, I hoped that things might have improved. However, the situation is much worse than it was two years ago. For one thing, there is much more of the security wall and the fence. We went to Abu Dis on the outskirts of Jerusalem and saw the 25-foot-high reinforced concrete wall snaking its way down the middle of the street, dividing communities, families and friends; people were unable to cross the barrier with any ease. When it is finished, they will be completely unable to cross it.

We saw new Israeli settlements outside Jerusalem. The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) referred to Ma'ale Adumim. That is a sizeable settlement and next to it there is an area referred to as the E1 zone. That is set aside for Israeli settlement—deep into the west bank. The Israelis clearly have every intention of fencing that off and putting the wall around it.

We went to see Israeli settlements way beyond the security barrier, deep in Palestinian territory, and we met settlers at Shiloh. We were shocked when we realised that there were so few cars on the main road out of Jerusalem to settlements many miles to the east. The only cars allowed on the road were Israeli cars—settlers' cars. As one drove past Palestinian villages on either side of the main road, one could see the small roads coming down from them. At the point at which they met the main road, they were sealed off by concrete barriers or earth mounds put up by Israeli defence force bulldozers. Even if a Palestinian could get on to the main road, there are IDF checkpoints every so often. If a Palestinian wants to go from one village to another to visit a relative, friend or place of work, their journey, which would have taken 10 minutes by car a while ago, will routinely take an hour or more on the back roads, although even those are subject to closure at no notice and at the whim of IDF conscripts. Underpinning all that is the tangible site of the wall encroaching into the west bank, which I thought was appalling.

If the west bank is worse than it was two years ago, nothing had prepared me for going to Gaza. Gaza has been described as the largest prison in the world because people cannot get in or out. Like many hon. Members, however, I have been inside prisons to see constituents, and it is a darn sight easier to get inside a prison. We were a visiting delegation of British Members of Parliament, with security clearance, diplomatic clearance and diplomatic-plated cars, and the Israelis had our passport numbers in advance, but we spent three hours kicking our heels at the Erez border crossing before we got into the Gaza strip.

I can see why the Israelis do not want British Members of Parliament to go into Gaza strip—they do not want the eyes of the world to see what is going on there. Frankly, it is shocking. There are thousands upon thousands of families living on less than $2 a day and trade is almost impossible. We went to look at the goods crossing at Karni, where every consignment of goods has to be dismantled, stripped down to its smallest component part and shipped from Palestinian trucks on to Israeli trucks. It is chaotic and inhuman and takes for ever. I cannot see how anybody manages to trade across the border.

As one drives through Gaza, especially the southern part, one sees the ruins of properties destroyed by the IDF, the bullet holes and the poverty. There is a palpable sense of a people who have been humiliated, subjugated and oppressed. I have an enduring memory of a small child—perhaps only three years old—playing in the dirt of a Gaza street under a billboard. There are billboards at the end of every road and they have on them paintings of what they describe as martyrs—the suicide bombers just from that street. Such people are lionised. What chance does that child have of growing up in the expectation of seeing any kind of peace or prosperity? It is a deeply depressing scenario.

It almost goes without saying that none of that oppression justifies the suicide bombings for one second. Such bombings must be unequivocally condemned wherever they take place. Whether innocent people die in Tel Aviv or, like a constituent of mine, in the 7/7 bombings, suicide bombings deserve unreserved condemnation. However, that does not mean that we should ignore the injustice in the Gaza strip. If terrorism is to succeed, it requires more just the terrorists themselves; it requires somebody to recruit the bomber, somebody to arm them, somebody to provide a safe house and somebody to transport them. As in Northern Ireland, there must also be a wider group of people in the community who acquiesce to the acts of terror taking place in their name and an even larger group who simply look the other way and do not bother about them. It is those other people whom we need to peel away from the terrorist cause.

The scenario is very depressing. The moderate Palestinian leadership is in danger of almost complete collapse in the Gaza strip. Last week, Fatah abandoned its primaries in scenes of absolute disarray. The al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade is becoming more popular, as is Hamas, partly because it is not Fatah, which is becoming tainted and seen as corrupt and out of touch. Fatah does not have much authority at all in the Gaza strip. If the Palestinian elections take place on 25 January—it is not absolutely certain that they will—it is entirely likely that Hamas will win a third of the vote across the Palestinian territories, and it is quite possible that it will be the outright winner in the Gaza strip.

There is a chink of light in the gloom—the border crossing at Rafah between the Gaza strip and Egypt. There is huge excitement among Palestinian people that at last they have some, if not total, control over a border crossing. It is a small building block on the road to nationhood, and they are incredibly pleased about it and incredibly proud of it. In passing, I should say what a fantastic job the European Union monitors are doing. They are mainly Italian Carabinieri, although I believe that British monitors are due out there, and they are doing a really good job.

I have come to some rather depressing conclusions about the middle east peace process and the knock-on effects that it will have on terror. Sharon seems likely to win the elections in Israel in March. He has a huge poll lead, and if he wins, I am sure that there will be a policy of unilateralism on the west bank just as there is in Gaza. I can see no will on the part of the Israeli Government to negotiate with the Palestinians. They will seek simply to impose their own solution. We know what that solution is on the west bank. A wall is being built deep into Palestinian territories. It is looping around new Israeli settlements, and there is no doubt that it will become the de facto border of Israel.

I suspect that most Members in the Chamber support, as I do, the road map and a two-state solution. I want a secure Israel that is at peace with a prosperous Palestinian state next door, but that is a long way from happening. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) said, in a two-state solution, one state cannot impose its will on the other state, but we are in grave danger of one state, Israel, leaving the other putative state, Palestine, with only disconnected fragments of unviable territory. That will not work. The Palestinians will not accept such a state, and to be honest, why should they?

There is a view in parts of Israeli society, which was articulated by the professor whom the Select Committee met last week, that the wall will provide peace, that it is enough, and that it will stop the suicide bombings. That is a chimera. It is simply nonsense. The wall may be able to reduce the number of suicide bombings, but it will not bring peace. It cannot. Peace can come about only if there are political and economic measures side by side with security measures. As we learned in Northern Ireland, security measures alone cannot provide lasting peace; they can provide only protection until lasting peace is found. The security wall is a blemish on Israel's reputation as a state, and its continued existence is an affront to human dignity in the whole of the middle east.

The report also mentions Guantanamo Bay. I realise that this may be a rare point of disagreement between my hon. Friend the Minister and me, but the war on terror is, at least in part, a war for human rights. Our opponents in this war have no respect for human rights. The people who carried out the 9/11 bombings and murdered 3,000 people have no respect whatever for the human rights of their victims. Nor do the people who carried out the bombings in Bali, London, Madrid, Turkey and Sharm al-Sheikh. Saddam had no respect for the human rights of his opponents, and neither did the Taliban for the human rights of their opponents in Afghanistan. I put it gently to my hon. Friend the Minister that we cannot prosecute a war for human rights while denying the human rights of our opponents, and that is essentially what is happening at Guantanamo Bay. As long as 500 people are kept there without recourse to the courts, any habeas corpus, full cognisance of the Geneva conventions and any prospect of being charged let alone released, that completely undermines our position.

In the war on terrorism, the United Kingdom and its allies in the United States are in the right. We should have the moral high ground, but it is difficult for us to occupy the moral high ground when it is being taken away from us by human rights abuses in places such as Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo Bay. We have a special relationship with the United States. We have stood—rightly, I believe—shoulder to shoulder with the United States ever since 9/11, and through Afghanistan and through Iraq. I voted for British troops to participate in the war in Iraq—I have been to Iraq since, and I will go back—and I believe that we were right to do so. Things have been difficult and we have made mistakes, but we were right to participate in the war in Iraq. We should now take the opportunity afforded to us by the special relationship to say, as America's best friend—best friends are sometimes the only people who can say this—that what is happening at Guantanamo Bay is wrong. It is undermining our position and the Americans should end it now.

3.41 pm

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): I shall confine my remarks to the situation in Iraq, which is obviously a subject of much comment in the Foreign Affairs Committee report and central to the debate about the war against terrorism. I say immediately in that context that we are all very concerned about the four hostages held by terrorists in Iraq, particularly, of course, Mr. Norman Kember, the British citizen. I am sure that we all support the efforts of the Secretary of State to do what he can in a very difficult situation. It is always difficult for Governments in this situation to bring about a successful outcome, but we must hope for one.

I voted against the war in Iraq for reasons that would take rather long to explain, so I shall not rehearse them again now. It has to be said, however, that the jury is still out on whether what happened was a good thing or a bad thing. I would not go along with Zhou Enlai, the former Chinese premier, who once said when asked whether the French revolution had been successful, "It's too early to say." However, I think that it will be some years before there can be a real judgment on whether the invasion of Iraq by British and American forces and others has been a success.

Having gone into Iraq, the questions are whether we should come out, when, how and what staying in is doing to the politics of the area and the war against terrorism. They were lively, immediate topics during my participation in the recent trip to the middle east by the Foreign Affairs Committee. I should perhaps explain that we split into two groups: one went to Israel and Gaza, and my little group went to Saudi Arabia and the Gulf. That was economical for taxpayers: we covered more ground at less cost. It is sensible for Committees to do that.

In the end, the questions whether we come out, when and how boil down to the security situation in Iraq, and that in the end boils down to the Iraqi army and police force. How strong are they? How far can they produce an orderly situation? The problems of achieving a strong Iraqi army and police force are immense. There is the language problem. Very few Arabic speakers have been seconded to the American and British forces there. After Pearl Harbour there was a huge effort in America to get Japanese speakers seconded into helping with the war. No similar attempt has been made, as far as I am aware, to get the 600,000 Arabic speakers in the United States involved in helping with that enormous problem. An inability to speak the language of the people whom one is dealing with leads to missing all the subtle signals that are so essential to training a foreign group in the art of counter-insurgency.

The culture of the American army is against a training role of this kind. It is a shooting army, designed to kill, which it no doubt does and has done extremely effectively in many theatres. It is not a training army. Indeed, training is regarded as a career loser in the American army. Someone who gets involved in the training of that army does not seriously promote their advancement.

People are also concerned about the effect on the morale of and recruitment to the army. There are problems with the national guard, too, which has been heavily relied on in the Iraqi theatre. The space of time that soldiers spend there is therefore extremely short. That, again, is inimical to a proper training role. I do not think that American forces have quite the depth of knowledge that British forces have traditionally had in this context.

One thinks of the old India hands in the British Army in India, which would no doubt have the sort of people we now need. In the romantic fiction of John Buchan that I used to read as a child there was someone called Sandy Arbuthnot, the third Baron Clanroyden, well known in the Tweeddale yeomanry, but even better known in the foothills of the Pamirs, in Samarkand and Tashkent and through the Taklaman desert and the Hindu Kush. It was all second nature to those redoubtable Scots—they were mainly Scots—who set out to play the great game in the north-west frontier. We are rather in need of such people nowadays, who could get into the skin of an Arab and find out what he thinks and feels. People from Carolina and Louisiana may be good in other respects.

That is a huge problem, but it is not only a training problem; there is also an equipment, logistics and support problem. I can say in favour of the American effort in Iraq that when Ambassador John Negroponte took over he switched huge resources from reconstruction to training. About $2 billion was simply switched from one column to another to help with the problem before the elections at the beginning of the year. That was wise and sensible, because those elections would not have proceeded as smoothly as they did if the effort had not been made to get 130,000 Iraqi soldiers up to speed for the purpose.

Some major American soldiers, such as Generals Petraeus and Dempsey, who are career soldiers, are taking the issue seriously and trying to train Iraqi soldiers in the way that they perceive to be necessary to deal with the situation. Efforts are clearly being made, but all the reports about the atmosphere in the White House and at the centre of Government suggest no real sense of urgency about developing such solutions. Paul Wolfowitz is now elsewhere doing other things. Meghan O'Sullivan, the President's special adviser on Iraq, has not even spoken in public since she was appointed a year ago. I do not know what she is doing. Donald Rumsfeld is dealing with the wider issues of army reform and the difficult problems that that entails. He is not solely focused on Iraq any more, if he ever was. All that suggests that there is not the necessary sense of direction to grasp such a difficult nettle with the appropriate firmness.

Although, according to most commentators, there is a reduced sense of urgency, the situation with training and logistics that I have described needs an intensification of effort. People need to be trained differently and to be there for longer periods, not for short tours. There is a growing gap between what is necessary on the ground and what is actually happening, and the view in Washington. That is the conclusion drawn in an article, which I recommend to all who are interested, in the December issue of The Atlantic Monthly by James Fallows, who is an expert in this area. In the final paragraph, he concludes:

"America's hopes today for an orderly exit from Iraq depend completely on the emergence of a viable Iraqi security force. There is no indication that such a force is about to emerge. As a matter of unavoidable logic, the United States must therefore choose one of two difficult alternatives: It can make the serious changes—", which I have just been trying to describe,

"including certain commitments to remain in Iraq for many years—that would be necessary to bring an Iraqi army to maturity. Or it can face the stark fact that it has no orderly way out of Iraq, and prepare accordingly."

I do not think that he is suggesting that the Americans should in any way embark on a kind of Vietnam exit of that sort.

All the people to whom I have spoken about this—including the highest in the land and my colleagues—were a little divided about whether we should pull out. In so far as people felt that we should pull out, they preceded that with two caveats. First, there should be a diplomatic démarche to ensure that it was done after parliamentary elections and over a period of time in which there could be clear explanations about why what was happening was happening. Secondly, they emphasised that there would still be some need for coalition forces to guard the frontiers of Iraq against Iran, and perhaps in the north. Those caveats were mentioned to us by Government Ministers. None the less, there was a clear understanding that it would be in the best interests of the conflict and of the credibility of Britain and America—there is no doubt that America and Britain have a lot at stake—as well as important for the war against terrorism that that should be considered.

The Government face the more difficult question of whether, if the Americans do not wish to pull out, the British should pull out anyway. That is more difficult because there are questions of honour, which were put to us plainly. We went in together, so can we reasonably come out separately? There is also the issue of logistics. Most of the American armour and equipment goes through the southern part of Iraq and Basra, which is controlled by the British, so there are delicate questions, such as: should the coalition forces pull out in those circumstances? Should Britain pull out separately from America? Can we really see the main alternative put forward by James Fallows in his article—a real reinforcement of the efforts necessary on the ground—being made by Washington in its present political stance? I do not pretend to have any answers to those difficult questions, and I am not proposing anything now, but the Government need to do some hard thinking over the next few months, which could be critical to the whole future of the effort in Iraq, whether one voted for or against it.

3.54 pm

Mr. Fabian Hamilton (Leeds, North-East) (Lab): I welcome this opportunity to speak in the debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee on opening it. He was not present when we drafted the report, which must have made what is already a difficult task more difficult.

All my colleagues on the Committee have pointed out something that remains obvious to all of us involved in the continuing struggle and debate on how we can secure a peace between the Palestinians and the Israelis. In whatever Arab or Muslim country that we visit, and we have been to many, one thing rises above everything else in the minds of those to whom we speak—all our interlocutors, whoever they may be: that there must be a just and peaceful settlement between Israel and the Palestinians. As other hon. Members have said, after last week's visit to Israel and the occupied territories, that peace seems as elusive—perhaps more so—than ever.

I was one of the Committee members who visited Saudi Arabia and the Gulf last week. Not being content with visiting only those regions, I went to Israel the previous week, at my own expense, to meet a constituent—a holocaust survivor who lives in Leeds. As a child, he was taken from Lodz ghetto in Poland to various concentration camps before being released at the age of 16 at Teresenstadt in May 1945. That man, Arek Hersh, went back to the concentration camps at Auschwitz and Birkenau for the first time last year. Yorkshire Television recently made a documentary about him. He had a room at the Yad Vashem holocaust museum in Jerusalem dedicated to him for the work that he does to bring the holocaust into sharp focus for the younger generations who simply have no recollection of it. Arek Hersh has done a brilliant job and he was being honoured at Yad Vashem. I wanted to be with him.

Of course, like most politicians, it is not good enough to simply be with a constituent, however far away. I have a long-standing and continuing interest in the future of Israel, and of the Palestinian people. Therefore, I made it my business to meet people with whom I could discuss current issues. I met very different people to those whom my colleagues met last week, and I came away with a slightly more optimistic view, although I am, of course, a realist.

The founders of the state of Israel had high ideals and one has to go back only 30 years to remember the Israel of Golda Meir, of David Ben Gurion, and of the kibbutzim to which so many students of my generation—whether Jewish or not—went during their summer vacations from university or after leaving school. Many still stand for the high ideals on which the state was founded, but not the majority, clearly.

Two weeks ago in Israel, I learned that the seismic shift taking place in politics could, if one is optimistic, and with a fair wind, have a beneficial effect. I am not trying to contradict anything that my colleagues have said. My hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope) said something on which we both agree, namely the effect of the wall that has been built to keep out terrorists and suicide bombers. The barrier has, largely, achieved that aim, although there was an attack just the other day in Netanya, a place to which many British people emigrate and where many of my former Leeds constituents now live. It is clear that the wall is not sufficient and I agree with my hon. Friend that the wall is a blemish on the Israeli state. I understand why it has been built, but I am horrified every time I see it.

We must be clear that the barrier takes the form of a wall around Jerusalem and Qalqilia, which we visited two years ago, but it is, in most parts, a fence and, in most places, it is on the green line. It is significant and it says much about the state of Israel that, just last year, the path of the barrier had to be altered because former members of the Israeli defence forces took their Government to the Israeli supreme court to have that path moved around the eastern part of Jerusalem. That is significant because the rule of law and the legal system was able to change a policy that would disastrously affect Palestinian farmers such as the one whom we met in Qalqilia, to whom my hon. Friend referred. Those people are honestly trying to farm their own land and are being cut off from the land between the village where they live and the land that they farm by the barrier. They are then taking several hours to get across the border simply to go to work and try to earn a living.

I met a number of interesting people while I was briefly in Israel. It was not the intense Foreign Affairs Committee visit with which we on the Committee are familiar. It did not involve meetings from 7 am until very late at night, but I had the chance to talk to some of our diplomats: Simon McDonald, our ambassador in Israel, whom many of us know well, gave me a long and full briefing over lunch in Tel Aviv; and Dr John Jenkins, our expert in East Jerusalem, who has the important job of trying to look after Arab and Palestinian interests on behalf of the British Government. Both those diplomats are experts in their field and can make an important contribution to what should be a road map to peace, but seems to be a road map away from peace—in fact, towards anything but peace.

So how do we move back towards a lasting settlement between Israel and the Palestinians? We all agree that the only future for Israel is a vibrant, democratic Palestine. That two-states solution, to which my hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee referred, is something that both he and I and many others have espoused for many years, and want to see achieved. Can it be achieved? What will the clear favourite to win the election in March next year, Ariel Sharon, a man for whom I have absolutely no time—he destroyed many of the moves that his predecessor, Ehud Barak, tried to make towards a lasting settlement—bring to Israeli politics and more importantly, to that elusive peace process if his Kadima party, the Forward party, wins the largest number of seats?

Even more important than that answer is what the Labour party can do. Is it genuinely newly invigorated by the surprise election of Amir Peretz, and the coalescence of the progressive peace forces around the Labour party? It is very much old Labour, not new Labour. Will Peretz win sufficient seats to be pivotal and to have sufficient influence on Ariel Sharon? I am afraid that we shall have to wait for the election outcome to see. The early indications, according to The Jerusalem Post, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn pointed out, are that Sharon looks set to win. However, Israeli politics are notoriously unpredictable: the Labour party, or another, could achieve a larger number of seats. We will have to wait to see the outcome.

One thing is for sure, however. The Likud party, the former party of Prime Minister Sharon, is divided. The bid for that party's leadership by the former Prime Minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, will be, in my opinion, the greatest danger posed towards any possibility of peace. Those of us who have heard Netanyahu in the House and elsewhere, and those of who met him in Israel when he was Prime Minister, will know that he is a man who stands for the concept of "eretz Yisrael"—a greater Israel—that conforms not to our notions of the green line and the 1967 borders, but to a notion of Israel according to the Old Testament, which excludes all Arabs and Palestinians and does not acknowledge their existence at all. That can only be truly dangerous for Israel's future and that of the Palestinian people.

I agree wholeheartedly that the poverty, oppression and day-to-day barriers put in the way of law-abiding Palestinian people will only turn them away from peace, conformity to the law, and an attempt to try to earn a living for themselves. That is increasingly impossible, now that they are going to be excluded from working in Israel itself. However, we must have hope—hope in adversity, as seems clear at present, certainly from the findings of my hon. Friends who were in Israel last week. A situation such as that can never be deemed to be hopeless. One of the factors that may make a difference is the role that diplomacy plays. Mention has been made of the role of the Quartet. When I met Ghassan Khatib, the Minister of Economic Planning—I know my colleagues also met him—I had one hour. He came to the American Colony hotel in East Jerusalem where I was staying and we discussed whether there was any hope for lasting peace or a settlement. He is a member of Fatah, of course, and was hopeful that the recent intervention of Condoleezza Rice and the role of the Quartet led by Jim Wolfensohn was a different factor that might make a difference.

I hope that the Government will make a plea to the United States to tell them that, if they put their minds to it, they and only they can have a powerful influence on Israel, whoever is elected to government, to get back on track with the road map and round the table for genuine negotiation. We all know, as do they, that negotiation with a partner is the only road to a lasting peace. The imposition of peace, however unilateral or well meaning, can mean nothing unless the partner is a true partner and will sit down and negotiate properly on equal terms.

I mentioned the role of diplomacy. We are fortunate to have good diplomats in the region; I have mentioned two. We also went to Saudi Arabia. We have there a diplomat who is working for the interests of this country, was the ambassador to Israel and still, even after two years, has a strong reputation: Sir Sherard Cowper-Coles. I am told that, now that he is our ambassador to Saudi Arabia, he is often summoned to update King Abdullah on the state of Israeli politics. As our former ambassador in Israel, he has many friends there and keeps up with the day-to-day developments. That can only be beneficial to us.

I want finally to mention the importance of Iran in our war against terror. The Iranians are trying to develop, we think, enriched uranium and plutonium for military grade weapons. It is important that we ensure that that development does not take place. Of course, the Iranians are entitled to civil and peaceful nuclear power, as they claim. It is important that the deal with the Russians to ensure that that enrichment cannot take place goes ahead and that pressure from the Government and those of Germany and France, as well as from Javier Solana on behalf of the EU, is successful. In the end, dialogue and constructive engagement will ensure that countries such as Iran do not develop such weaponry. It is in the interests of everybody in the world, not just the region, that we ensure that they do not.

4.8 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I will take a slightly different perspective to that which has developed so far by asking people to look back at some historical parallels and to the problems of propaganda and counter-propaganda in war.

I mean to look back a long way to the autumn of 1914 when a photograph was prominently published on the front pages of a number of British newspapers showing what was obviously a Royal Navy battleship sinking beneath the waves. The headline was "An audacious picture". The battleship, as the Chamber may have guessed, was HMS Audacious, which had been holed by a mine. The reason that the Government were so upset about the picture being published was that they felt that the news of the loss of the battleship should be suppressed for fear of undermining morale at home in the early stages of the great war. It was, of course, a forlorn hope that such a disaster could be concealed from the British public and, indeed, it was not.

By the second world war, the Government had learned a great deal about warfare propaganda. When one looks at the films that were made during the war—many dealt with events in occupied European countries—one is struck by the fact that they were dauntingly realistic. The cavalry did not always come to the rescue. The paratroops did not always land in the nick of time. The tanks did not always roll through the defences just in time to save the partisans from the firing squads. On the contrary, those who played the freedom fighters and the men and women of the resistance in those films often paid with their fictional lives, just as the people of the resistance and the freedom fighters in reality paid with their lives in the occupied countries that the films fictionally represented. Instead of the usual two-word ending, the films would often end with a defiant three words: "Not The End". In other words, the fight went on despite the sacrifices.

What has all that to do with the conflicts that have been so articulately discussed today? Quite a lot, I suggest. The belief has grown that war is something that can be waged cleanly, quickly and with minimal loss. In fact, it is horrible, unjust and dirty. It is extremely costly in lives and in the damage caused to all the countries involved, whether they are innocent bystanders and victims or aggressive nations that are being resisted.

The battle that is being faced today would I suppose have been called low intensity warfare in the 1960s and 1970s. It is therefore rather surprising that we do not seem to have learned all that much from the two main post-war conflicts in which Britain has been involved—namely, the conflict in Northern Ireland, which has already been mentioned, and the conflict in Malaya, which has not. One of those conflicts went on for three decades and the other for 12 years.

Some hon. Members will have received representations from servicemen anxious to know if they will be allowed to receive medals from the present Malaysian Government in gratitude for what they did then. What worries me is whether the Malay conflict could have been pressed to a successful conclusion, with the sort of tactics that had to be used over such a long period, had the spotlight of publicity been shining upon it, focusing day by day on every incident and every casualty.

It was said earlier that security alone did not bring peace to Northern Ireland, and that political solutions had to be found. That is a one-dimensional view of what solved the conflict—if, indeed, it has been solved. Political solutions would not have been found had it not been for the security presence and the political determination of successive British Governments to make it clear that no matter how many murders or atrocities took place—can one imagine anything more heinous, despicable and contemptible than blowing up the people at the Enniskillen war memorial on Remembrance day?—the IRA would in the end have to conclude that they would not be able to bomb and kill their way to victory. Therefore, the political solution was contingent on the ongoing long-term security and military contribution, backed up by the political will to win. It worries me greatly, when we consider the situation in Iraq, to hear people talking about bringing troops back soon, and saying, "Next year, before the election, we will hand over security to the local forces." That smacks not so much of the approach that was successful over a long period in Malaya and Northern Ireland, but of the process that was tried and failed in Vietnam. Let us face the fact that if we engage in a conflict with a combination of outside extremists and domestic insurgents, we will not be able, in the short term, to hand over the security situation to the indigenous forces.

Mike Gapes: Is there not a big difference between the situation in Iraq—or even that in Vietnam—and that which existed in Malaya? Malaya was a colony at the time, not an independent state, and it did not have a democratic process or a putative sovereign Government that was going to have its own views on whether and how it would get assistance from international forces. The hon. Gentleman's parallel is slightly wrong.

Dr. Lewis: Historical analogies are always debatable because, by definition, they are not identical to the situation that we face today. However, I do not believe that either of the factors that the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) mentioned reflects on the principal point that the communist insurgents in Malaya did not have the external support that is enjoyed by today's insurgents in Iraq. They were, therefore, in a weaker position, yet it still took 12 long years for them to be defeated.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): One thing that I hope will come out of the report of our visit to Saudi Arabia is that we are engaged in a battle of minds. Frederick the Great said that one cannot ride on horseback against ideas, but at the moment we have to do so. Saudi Arabians are extremely proactive at dealing with the kind of extremist ideas that are developing, so the picture is not quite as depressing as it might appear to be.

Dr. Lewis: I am delighted that the hon. Lady made that intervention. It neatly brings me to the central point that I was about to make. That is that victories in such environments depend wholly on having the majority of the indigenous population—however much they have been terrorised, bullied and attacked by extremist minorities—on one's side. We have a long way to go in that respect.

I venture to suggest that the Government have not even begun seriously to address the issue. By that I mean that our military opponents are not physically strong. They are not exactly endowed with powerful weapons systems although, of course, we have to fear that they might acquire some. However, they are masters of propaganda, and we are not doing what we should be doing. We should be learning the lessons of the propagandists—I use the term non-perjoratively—of world war two. We should quite openly be going on the offensive with a propaganda operation to make it absolutely clear what the true situation is and what values we are fighting for.

The other day, there was a shock-horror story in the press. The Americans had been found to be paying a newspaper in Iraq to publish some good news stories. All I can say is that I would be surprised and annoyed if they were not doing so, and I hope that they do more of it. We must not try to suppress bad news, because that will sink in the same way in which the attempt to suppress the loss of the Audacious did. We must actively promote the good news about what our forces are doing time after time.

We must go on the offensive and detail name by name, incident by incident and atrocity by atrocity what our opponents are doing. We must highlight these facts, instead of glossing over the fact that 30 people have been killed in a suicide bombing in a restaurant or a market. We must publicise again and again the nature of the victims, who overwhelmingly will have been ordinary Iraqis.

There is one more thing we must do. We must ask whether it is our fault that extremists in Iraq are killing other Iraqis because of the coalition's invasion and are trying to make us lose our nerve and pull out, or whether it is the fault of the extremists who do not mind killing the people whom we went in with a view to helping to build a peaceful and democratic state. One has only to pose the question to arrive at the correct answer.

Much has been said about the business of us not besmirching our own record by behaving unacceptably. That is certainly true, but it is also true, as I say time and again in these debates, that free societies cannot survive if they insist on tolerating the intolerant. There is something very wrong with our set-up when it takes us 10 years to extradite from the UK across the channel to France someone who is strongly suspected of being a terrorist. The French Government and the French people were justifiably appalled at the way in which that extradition, which has at last happened, was spun out for so long and with so little justification.

There is also something wrong with a system such as ours in which we would not be able to extradite Osama bin Laden or his deputy to the United States of America, if, by some chance, they fell into our hands, unless we were assured that they would not face the death penalty there. This is where the asymmetry of this sort of conflict comes in, because there are groups that do not observe the laws of war and put themselves outside all conventions, yet are the first to claim the protection of the legal systems of the countries that they seek to destroy when it looks as if they are being cornered.

Something was said about 7 July earlier in the debate. For me, the lasting image will be of the two suspects—I put it no higher than that—who were arrested on the balcony. Fearing for his life, the first words of one of them were, "I have my rights." Okay, he has his rights, but must we be overly obsessed by the rights of people who want to destroy the very basis of a society that gives rights to anyone at all?

We must set up a systematic operation actively to promote the positive case for what the coalition forces and the security services are doing. In promoting that case, we must not paint rosy pictures suggesting that victory is just around the corner; we must tell the British people the truth. If we do that, they will not let us down.

4.25 pm

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I start by bringing our attention back to the Select Committee report. A lot hinges on the first sentence of the summary, which states:

> "We recommend that in its response to this Report the Government make a statement of how it ensures that it pursues its various foreign policy priorities in ways which take into account their inter-connectedness".

I was struck by the slightly clumsy word "inter-connectedness" and I wondered what it meant in this context. To begin with, I feared that it alluded to an excessive attachment to policy tidiness and that policies would need to conform to a degree of consistency just for the sake of it. The more I thought about it, however, the more I realised that coherence is essential if, to quote the excellent words of the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope), we are to win not only the war on terrorism, but the war for human rights. My fear, which the report sets out in great detail, is that if we are too inconsistent and erratic in prosecuting our war for human rights—as he rightly said, it is an indispensable component of our war against terrorism—we risk feeding precisely those forces of anger, radicalism and public alienation that have done so much in other parts of the world to provide the seedbed in which terrorism has been allowed to flourish.

I therefore want to highlight two obvious areas in which an inconsistent approach by the Government and the United Kingdom will risk inflaming the public debate and the feeling that seems to propel young Arabs, in particular, towards terrorism. First, I want to talk about extraordinary rendition.

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman did not mean to say "young Arabs", because the greater part of the Muslim population in this country is from south Asia. Members of that community take great exception to being lumped into one homogenous group; they are not Arabs.

Mr. Clegg: I stand corrected and rightly so. I take on board the observation that the Minister rightly makes.

"Extraordinary rendition" is a euphemism and much sinister intent might lie behind it. The debate about this issue has now escalated, for all the reasons with which we are familiar. We, as a country, need not only to ensure that we behave with due regard to law and proper process, but to dispel any doubts elsewhere in the world that we are complicit in any way in a practice that could rightly be seen as a flagrant case of double standards.

I recently read that Condoleeza Rice had said that rendition was required

"where the terrorists cannot in practice be reached by the ordinary processes of law".

She added that

"the captured terrorists of the 21st century do not fit easily into traditional systems of criminal or military justice."

No wonder that legitimate fears have arisen that extraordinary rendition is nothing more than a way in which suspects can be apprehended illegally, out of the ambit of the law, to be subject to mistreatment in a manner that is illegal and immoral and that undermines the fundamentals of our moral case in the war against terrorism. We are all entitled to ask questions of the Government about their response—which so far has not been entirely clear—to the events as information has come out into the public domain in dribs and drabs.

I draw the Minister's attention, first, to page 9 of the Government response to the Select Committee's report. It states:

"The British Government has not received any requests, nor granted any permissions, for the use of UK territory or airspace for these purposes"— namely, the landing and taking off of the aeroplanes holding the suspected terrorists. There appears to be a well documented body of evidence suggesting that up to 400 flights have landed and taken off from British airports. It simply stretches credulity that that can have taken place without the British authorities and the British Government having any knowledge of it whatever. I would like the Minister to put my fears to rest: it is either an act of extraordinary incompetence or something much worse to suggest that 400 such flights can take place without the Government being aware of them at all.

Secondly and perhaps of even greater importance is the attitude that the Government should have towards the US interpretation of the legal context in which the process of extraordinary rendition has taken place. The convention against torture quite explicitly stipulates that any transfer of individuals to a country where there are substantial grounds for believing that they would be in danger of being subjected to torture should be prohibited. However, if I understand the situation correctly, the US Administration have picked their words extremely carefully to suggest that they will not tolerate any extraordinary rendition if they believe that the individual in question will be tortured. There is a world of difference between someone saying that they believe a person will be tortured and saying that they think a person may be in danger of being tortured. It seems to me that a great deal hinges on that.

If we are going to lower the bar, as the words of the US Government seem to suggest, so that there is a unilateral judgment on whether someone will be tortured and that judgment will determine whether extraordinary rendition should take place, that will totally fly in the face of the letter and the spirit of the convention against torture. I am keen to know the Minister's attitude towards that subtle legal reinterpretation of the terms of the convention.

Thirdly and finally, it is worth recalling—this seems to have fallen slightly beyond the parameters of the public debate over the past few days—that the convention against torture does not just prohibit torture. It also prohibits "other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment".

In other words, the convention against torture, to which we are a signatory, goes far wider in terms of the forms of treatment or maltreatment that it covers than the definition of torture that has become the focus of so many of the legal niceties and pronouncements by the US Government. I hope that the Minister will confirm that the UK Government want the full and unconditional application of the full definition in the convention against torture.

This is not just a series of debating points. It goes to the core of the legitimacy of our war against terrorism. If we cannot uphold the legal and moral principles that we invoke in our fight against terrorists, we significantly weaken our case and blemish the standing of this nation and our beliefs and views elsewhere in the world. That does untold damage to the long-term prospects of the war against terrorism.

I want to mention the middle east conflict. I shall be briefer on this point, not least because so much has been said in an extremely articulate and pointed fashion. It is almost trite to observe that a durable settlement in that ancient conflict would do much to allay the false stereotypes, the anger, the vitriol and the hostility that feed so much of the opinion, in other parts of the world, that bears directly on the rise in terrorism throughout the world. I was struck by how tentative the Select Committee's report is about the middle east. The section on the middle east—I am not sure whether the fact is representative of anything—is just over two pages. That compares to almost 11 pages on Libya.

Mr. Pope: I should point out that the report is the sixth report of the Committee on the foreign policy aspects of the war on terrorism. Previous reports have covered the middle east in great length, which is why the focus in the present one has shifted to other areas.

Mr. Clegg: I wonder, too, however, whether the shortness of the passage is also related to an understandable reticence about pronouncing from outside, so to speak, on a conflict that is so complex. Page 101 includes the statement that the Committee recognises fully that "the danger that active engagement by the West with a view to influencing the outcome of events in the Middle East more widely could be counter-productive, unless it is sought and welcomed by the people of the region and by their representatives."

That has been borne out fully by the comments of other hon. Members. It is almost inconceivable that any durable settlement could be achieved without bold, forthright and principled influence being brought to bear from the outside.

I recently visited Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Ramallah, Hebron and other parts of the west bank and I should like to add something to what others have said: although the barrier, or wall, or whatever one wants to call it, is the most striking and visible expression of division and hostility in the west bank today, it disguises something that is in many ways more pervasive and destructive—the almost totally dysfunctional nature of the west bank itself.

The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) rightly talked of the hundreds of road blocks, both permanent and temporary, and the complex—almost byzantine—system of permits, that make it almost impossible for people to do their jobs, meet their families or travel from one town to another. I experienced that when we tried to travel from Hebron back to east Jerusalem. We were stopped at three road blocks. It took hour upon hour. The crescendo of frustration and hostility felt in the crowds of people caught up in the road blocks was tangible.

I find it striking that the slightly less visible form of fragmentation that is imposed on the west bank does not seem to be well known among Israelis. I am not sure whether this anecdote is worth much, although it spoke volumes to me. I had supper with an old friend of mine, with whom I used to study in the United Kingdom, and who is now a best-selling author in Israel. He is very much of what I should call a liberal-progressive persuasion and sends his children to one of the few Arab-Israeli schools in Jerusalem. In conversation, it became quite obvious that despite assiduous reading of liberal press publications in Israel, he was almost totally unaware of the extent to which life in the west bank had been fragmented and disfigured by the web of physical and bureaucratic obstacles that make it impossible for the Palestinian community even to approach a semblance of social, political and economic, let alone geographic, contiguity.

It is therefore incumbent on those of us who care passionately about an equitable peace settlement in the region, to do everything in our powers to ensure that the Israeli Government and authorities are not allowed to forget that the rest of us are watching what is happening in the west bank with increasing concern. That is not because we do not understand the need to take measures to protect Israelis against suicide attacks—of course, the attack in recent days has only reinforced that—but that making the Palestinian community so dysfunctional makes it all the more likely that there simply will not be a partner to negotiate with in any final peace settlement.

My final question for the Minister is whether the existence and pervasiveness of the closures is being raised in sufficiently forceful terms by the Government in their contacts with the Israeli Government. As a postscript, I have read that a number of campaigners have called for the use of existing agreements between the European Union and the Israeli Government to try to highlight some of these issues. Personally, I do not think that there is any merit in talking loosely about invoking economic trade sanctions, embargoes or whatever. It is politically totally unrealistic and would almost certainly be counter-productive.

What struck me when I talked to officials on the ground, both British diplomats and diplomats from other EU states, was that they had apparently not discussed among themselves or with their various political masters in the EU capitals whether the provisions of the EU-Israel association agreement are being properly monitored in the first place. As the Minister will know, it is a very complete agreement covering a number of trade and economic issues. It also includes a number of crucial human rights and other provisions that place a legal obligation on Israel to respect the rule of law in all that it does and equally place a legal obligation on the EU to ensure that that is monitored fully and continuously. I am concerned that there does not seem to be any mechanism for that monitoring to take place.

I understand that there will be a meeting between the EU under the British presidency and the Israeli Government on 12 December at which there are plans to establish a so-called human rights committee. I should be keen to know what the Minister thinks that committee will do to provide the proper monitoring of an agreement that plays such a crucial role in regulating the relationship between ourselves and Israel. Extraordinary rendition and our approach to the circumstances on the ground in the middle east are two notable areas—there are others, of course—where a degree of "interconnectedness" and "coherence", as the report puts it, seem absolutely essential if we are to continue to assume the moral high ground but also develop a strategy that is both principled and effective in prosecuting our war against terrorism.

4.44 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): It is a great pleasure to welcome you to the Chair, Sir Nicholas, and to speak under your chairmanship this afternoon. I also welcome the Minister back from his travels in Afghanistan. I congratulate the Chairman and the members of the Select Committee on their report. This has been an excellent debate that has made a great contribution.

Let me start on a personal note. On 11 September 2001, my husband was working for Delta airlines. That was one of the American airlines that did not, fortunately, lose aircraft. However, it was, of course, deeply affected by the losses. It was the first time in history that anyone had conceived of using aircraft for that purpose, and the loss of life of passengers, air crew and people in the buildings was beyond imagination. It is worth remembering that successive Governments had come to grips with the terrorist threat that we then faced in this country and in Europe. Regrettably, when Europeans, such as my husband, who worked for American carriers tried to persuade the Americans that it was a possibility that terrorists might take to the skies and that that might take a form as gross as that which we saw on 9/11, their words fell on deaf ears. I am delighted that America has now recovered and taken dramatic measures to prevent such dreadful events from happening again.

I am sure that many of us, like my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam), are thinking of the British and other hostages in Iraq. We wish the Foreign Office every success in negotiating their release.

There has been much talk about the middle east peace process. I am envious of the excellent visits that have been made, particularly the recent one by the Select Committee, which clearly learned a great deal. Its members were very privileged to make some of the visits that they did.

Will the Minister comment on the Foreign Office assessment of the likely success of the current middle east process, looking forward to the elections in Israel next year? In particular, as one or two speakers have hinted during the debate, will it be a genuine two-states settlement or, as regrettably appears likely at the moment, a unilateral approach by Israel? An update on that situation will be most welcome.

I have followed closely the debate in the European Union on the fight against terrorism. Since the attacks of 11 September 2001, the European Union has been determined to step up its fight against terrorism and, in 2002, it adopted a framework decision on combating terrorism. Can the Minister give us a progress report? Have the member states been able to align their legislation and set out minimum rules on terrorist offences?

The framework decision lays down the penalties that member states must incorporate in their national legislation and I know that one of them relates to the freezing of funds of a list of terrorists and terrorist groups. That is not working wholly as was intended, and I shall be interested to hear whether the Minister shares my view. In particular, the 1998 joint action that was outlined on the identification, tracing and confiscation of instrumentalities and proceeds from crime has not been successful in Zimbabwe. Does he share my concerns in that regard?

I understand that the Minister has just returned from Afghanistan. British and American forces have had some success there in removing the Taliban. However, does he fear that they have merely been displaced? The hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes), who chairs the Select Committee, has performed an excellent task this afternoon in giving us a good overview of the report despite not having sat through the evidence. Now that we know that al-Qaeda is operating from more remote cells—that there is not just one headquarters—it is much more difficult to respond to it. Will the Minister update us on his assessment of that matter?

In our view, terrorism and extremism must be confronted and overcome wherever they appear. Obviously, a more international approach to terrorism is more effective. Action must be taken where necessary against rogue states—the breeding grounds of international terrorism. We are deeply concerned that opium growing in Afghanistan seems to be continuing unabated; there is undoubtedly evidence that proves that much of the income from the opium growing is being used to fund terrorism.

Some 18 months ago, I attended an excellent briefing given by the UK ambassador to the United Nations, Sir Emyr Jones-Parry. I understand that dealing with opium growing is a massive task. However, the Government are president of the organisation that is examining the matter—I think that it is being done through the G8—and I am disappointed at the results to date. We would lend every possible support that we could to the Government's encouragement for the growth of alternative crops, although that would obviously take place jointly with the Minister's colleagues, not just at the Foreign Office but at the Department for International Development. However, there must be some control of the opium industry, which seems to have continued to grow unabated, even though we have seen the demise of the Taliban.

The situation in Iraq has provoked a stimulating debate this afternoon. My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington took a different view from me on the war on Iraq, and raised the question of how long our troops will be based there. Reverting for a moment to Afghanistan, I shall mention that a group will be going from the Allenbrook barracks at Topcliffe to Afghanistan, but we still do not know what remit the next set of troops going to Afghanistan will have. Will the Minister update us on how the Government see the projected withdrawal from Iraq and give us his view on whether that can be done elegantly, as I am sure everyone in the Chamber this afternoon would wish?

The conclusions in the Select Committee report—paragraph 25 onwards—relate to the migration of people, particularly across the Mediterranean, and refer to the countries of the Maghreb. We ignore the countries of the Maghreb at our peril. My mind was not put any more at rest on that matter when I turned to the Government response to the Select Committee report. We have seen the recent developments in the Spanish principalities of Ceuta and Melilla, with Africans trying to come into the European Union through those enclaves. Conclusion 37 of the Select Committee is well made and hard hitting:

"We conclude that insufficient priority has been attached to an exchange of high-level visits between the United Kingdom and Morocco."

[Miss Anne McIntosh]

That could also apply to some of the other Maghreb countries. When the Minister sums up, will he tell us what measures the Government are taking in respect of the migration of peoples across the Mediterranean?

As early as July 2003, the Conservative party called for an examination of international law. It struck a chord when the Prime Minister agreed to come up with some proposals. However, I think that those proposals were published some time ago, so it would be helpful if the Minister could update us on what stage has been reached on that matter.

In connection with domestic policy, there are other efforts that the Government could make, particularly to avoid a clash of civilisations in the UK. It would not be in any of our interests to give disaffected Muslims, whom al-Qaeda might attempt to recruit, the impression that we are their enemy. We certainly are not. Can the Minister confirm whether the Government are minded to incorporate some of the proposals that we set out when the Terrorism Bill reached the House of Commons, such as encouraging the training of more imams in Britain, so that their teachings will be seen as consistent with the society in which they preach? That would be seen to be a positive instrument to deploy.

I speak as the Member for the Vale of York in north Yorkshire and it was a source of great concern to us all in the Yorkshire and Humber region that the culprits of the July bombings came from the Leeds-Bradford area. We thought locally that the integration of all the different cultures and civilisations in Yorkshire and Humber had been handled as sensitively as possible. When we saw the hatred felt by the four accused suspects and the lengths to which they went, that was an obvious source of concern. Will the Government consider measures, such as introducing the training of more imams in this country, to lead to greater integration?

Overall, we welcome and commend the conclusions; they are well thought out and well examined. The evidence that the Select Committee took speaks forcefully for itself. I recognise the work, over successive reports, that the Government have done. My right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley) suggested that perhaps the gloomiest outcome for the United Kingdom would be for the war on terror to strike at the heart of the country: we have already had one such successful attack, and one less successful one, this year.

What resources are the Government making available to combat such a threat? Why, in particular, have the Government not seen fit to appoint a Minister for homeland security—we have appointed such a shadow Minister—who would straddle the various Departments? There are too many Departments involved in the fight against terrorism in this country—there are international, defence and home aspects, as I mentioned, such as the Terrorism Bill and other legislation. It would be welcome also to recognise that the country has, at present, little protection against rogue ballistic missiles. We recognise the work currently being undertaken in the United States, and we make a plea to the Minister and ask whether similar work is being reciprocated here.

There has been much talk this afternoon about rendition. The Government set out, on page 8 of their response to the Select Committee report, in response to conclusion 12:

"This is not the same as operating a general policy of use of information extracted under torture. The UK unreservedly condemns the use of torture and has worked hard with our international partners to eradicate this."

I have great sympathy with the position set out by Condoleezza Rice on behalf of the United States on their policy of rendition, being one of transport and not related to torture in any shape or form. Equally, however, I have sympathy with some of the excellent points that were made this afternoon. There is a greater need for transparency on what form such transport is taken, what category of prisoner has been transported, and for what specific purpose.

It has been a rewarding debate, in which I am delighted to have taken part. I look forward to the next Select Committee report on this issue.

5 pm

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): As ever, Sir Nicholas, it is a great pleasure to speak under your chairmanship. I am pleased that the Foreign Affairs Committee has chosen to hold this debate, which has been of a high quality, into the sixth report of its inquiry into the foreign policy aspects of what it calls the war against terrorism.

Before I reply to the many important and insightful points raised by hon. Members, I welcome the new members of the Committee, including the recently arrived Chairman. The primary role of the Committee is, of course, to scrutinise the work of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, but in performing that task, its members serve—I am sure that you will agree, Sir Nicholas—as unpaid ambassadors for the UK in their many contacts with foreign Governments. Those contacts not only help, I hope, to deepen the Committee's understanding of the challenges facing us in countering terrorism, but build powerful bridges of understanding with the many countries with which we co-operate to reduce the terrorist threat.

I was glad to hear comments such as those made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Hamilton), who has left the Chamber for the moment, about the sterling work done by many of our diplomats abroad under difficult circumstances.

As many hon. Members have said, the threat that we currently face from terrorism is different in many respects from the appalling Irish republican terrorism that we experienced in this country after 1969. The hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) drew our attention to the terrible atrocity at Enniskillen, which was as bad as anything that we could ever imagine being perpetrated in this country. The ferocious and indiscriminate suicide bombing by terrorists in London in July illustrated graphically and tragically that we face a new terrorism.

The geographical spread of the terrorist threat is very wide. There were bombings in Sharm al-Sheikh and Bali. I went to look at the monument in Bali. No one could fail to be moved by such an appalling waste of human life, especially young life. There have also been bomb attacks in Bangladesh. That country was not mentioned in today's debate, but I was there about three weeks ago and am probably more worried about it than any other country that I have visited. It is prone to terrorism and gangsters—currently the judiciary are being targeted. Bangladesh could easily become a substitute for Afghanistan, in that it could be open season for all kinds of fundamentalist terrorist organisations. Indeed, it is rapidly heading that way. We need to pay a great deal of attention to that country.

In addition, there have been kidnappings in Iraq and Afghanistan. I fervently hope that Mr. Kember and his colleagues will be released. There has been unprecedented and wide-ranging demand that they should be, and I hope that the people who have kidnapped them will see reason and release them.

Those attacks, and others that I do not have time to list, do not weaken our resolve or stem our determination. We will not place our enemies on a pedestal. On the contrary, their murderous activities have served to reinforce our commitment to protect our people and prevent the terrorists from achieving their aims. The terrorists who now seek to bring death to our streets have no positive vision of the future. They trade in human misery, but our values, including the strength of our diverse society, are stronger than the values of those who glory in destruction. We heard something about those values in our debate this afternoon.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope) rightly talked about the absolute centrality of not taking our eye off the ball for one moment, and other hon. Members have rightly said that we cannot win the war by military means. I am old enough to remember many, many guerrilla wars. It was fascinating to listen to the hon. Member for New Forest, East talking about the war in Malaysia. I join him in saying that I am not sure what we in this country would have made of that war if it had been transmitted live 24 hours a day. Every British soldier who died and every atrocity that was committed, and it was a war that was marked by atrocities, would have been headline news. We must think about that. My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mike Gapes) remarked that perhaps this is a very different time and that comparisons are difficult to make, but I was very glad that the hon. Gentleman made that comparison.

I heard in Afghanistan a few days ago that there is great respect for British troops, for Customs and Excise officials and for all the other people in Afghanistan who are working to train the Afghanis to build capacity in their departments so that they can take on roles in security and elsewhere. The biggest fight of all, to which the Liberal spokesman the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) drew attention, is to inculcate a sense that one cannot have democracy without respect for human rights. That is sometimes difficult to understand.

We have heard about some of the fears hon. Members have about southern Iraq, the politicisation of the police, and the factions that are using parts of the police force to carry out their vendettas and some very cruel acts. We must, without question, challenge that every step of the way. We will have real problems if we do not adhere to those values and basic human rights.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn must catch a plane, but I hope that I shall be able to address some of the points that he made about Guantanamo Bay and other places before he leaves. I know that he feels strongly about it and he is right to use the term "double standards". We cannot be seen to be committing troops and our brave young people who work for the Department for International Development in difficult circumstances if at the same time we are seen to be complicit in denying people their basic human rights. That is crucial.

The argument is complex. I am not saying that there are not people in Guantanamo Bay and other places who are extremely dangerous. We have them in this country. I worry a great deal, as the hon. Member for New Forest, East does, about where we go in this debate. I have been trying to negotiate my way around the problem of the Maghreb and thinking about how we may return some of those people. Not all of them are terrorists, by the way; some of them are simply gangsters. We know of one man from Morocco who has political asylum in this country and has swindled thousands of Moroccan families out of their life savings. The Moroccans cannot understand why we cannot return this guy. We have to say that we must satisfy our courts that Morocco is not going to abuse his human rights if he is sent back. That is a key question.

Libya is one of the most remarkable stories about which I have heard. It appears to want to rejoin the family of nations, but it is difficult to find a monitoring group, such as a non-governmental organisation or a human rights organisation, in Libya, which is emerging from a very different period of its history, that could check on and be seen to be checking properly on prisoners whom we might return there, to ensure that their human rights are not abused.

That is a difficult issue and there is no question that it will consume court time and make a lot of lawyers rich in the next few months. Perhaps the Foreign Affairs Committee can consider that subject in the near future.

Dr. Julian Lewis: The Minister says that lawyers will be making money out of accusations of abuse. Is there anything that the Government can do about lawyers going to Iraq, ambulance chasing and touting for business in order to enable criminal cases to brought against our servicemen and women?

Dr. Howells: I am not aware of such ambulance chasing. If it is going on, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be kind enough to let me know who the individuals are and where they are touting for business. It is not the easiest environment to tout for business—at least not the parts of Iraq that I have visited—although I have no doubt that the profession is a proud and a resourceful one, let me put it like that.

I turn to the great wodge of notes that I have made during this fascinating debate. I shall start by answering the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South. He asked what the Government have been doing to counter the internet propaganda of al-Qaeda and others. In 2005 the Foreign Office created a new resource to monitor radical websites, which has improved our understanding of the size and the nature of the problem. During our G8 and EU presidencies this year, we made tackling the terrorist use of the internet a priority. The G8 interior Ministers' meeting in June acknowledged the importance of the problem and called for an update on progress to counter such use at its meeting under the Russian presidency. On 1 December, the European Union justice and home affairs council announced a new strategy to counter radicalisation and recruitment. It includes action to tackle the terrorist use of the internet. It is an important matter and I am glad that my hon. Friend raised it.

The issue is not an easy one to tackle. I spoke to the intelligence services of one EU member state—I shall say no more than that—who spoke about what they call self-combusters. I was told that a week before, they had arrested a 17-year-old man. He was from a respectable family of Algerian descent, with a hard-working mother and father. The intelligence services had been picking up things on the internet but they could not understand what they were. They managed to track down the source and went to the house in question. The parents said, "We don't know anything about this." When asked if they had any children, they said, "Yes, we have a son." They went to the boy's room and found that he had already made his bomb—he got the recipe from the internet—and that he was about to make his valedictory statement before going out to find a target. He was going to blow himself up. That 17-year-old—that child—had images on his bedroom walls of martyrs with bandanas and Kalashnikovs and the rest of the paraphernalia. We should never discount that romantic image, nor the terrible promises of what such people will receive when they go to heaven.

I think—and hon. Members have hinted at this—that something has to be said. I cannot answer the question about how many imams will be trained and so on. I sense strongly that it is something that the Muslim community in Britain has to do, but I would very much like to see some of the leading clerics say, "If you commit suicide and kill people around you, you will go straight to hell." However it is interpreted, I do not believe that the Koran offers a passage to heaven and virgins—I cannot remember how many. Leading Muslim clerics are important to young Muslims in this country. That relationship is important, and those clerics must tell them that terrorists will go to hell for their actions. They are killing other Muslims, such as those who were killed in the London bombings. I met two uncles of one of those victims in Sylhet in Bangladesh just a few weeks ago. They were brave dignified men who were appalled that another Muslim could have slaughtered that beautiful young girl who had come to this country to find a good life. She was making a good life for herself. That tells us everything.

I enjoyed the contribution of the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir John Stanley). He asked what we were doing to protect the United Kingdom and its citizens against the dangers of weapons of mass destruction and chemical attacks by terrorists. I am glad that he mentioned the importance of understanding the significance of the coming together of weapons of mass destruction and terrorists. The right hon. Gentleman drew our attention—as does the report—to the dangers of old stockpiles of weapons. I represented the presidency of the EU at a conference on how best to deal with dismantling chemical weapons. He will know that that is a vital, but enormously expensive process. I cannot remember the exact figure, but I believe that the Americans have set aside $32 billion for their programme to dismantle chemical weapons. They have already given the Russians $1 billion to facilitate their dismantling programme. The right hon. Gentleman vividly described the immediate dangers of those old stockpiles and how they must be guarded. That is the first line of defence. We are devoting considerable resources to that matter.

New measures are being adopted—for example, the control, safety and security of radioactive materials in the UK and those being imported into the country. The Government are implementing a range of other initiatives—for example, work at our border points on detecting chemical, biological, nuclear or radiological material. The right hon. Gentleman is quite right to say that preparedness is the key. The UK has held a number of exercises in responding to a chemical, biological, nuclear or radiological attack—for example, the exercise at Bank underground station in 2004. The Government are investing considerable resources to bolster the capability of our front-line emergency services to deal with such attacks. Internationally, the UK is a leading player in promoting the implementation of UN Security Council resolution 1540 of 2004, which aims to stop terrorists acquiring weapons of mass destruction.

Sir John Stanley: I am grateful to the Minister for his response. While one appreciates the importance of contingency planning after the event, would he not agree that the central requirement is to prevent the horrendous event from happening in the first place? Can he give us any assurance that the Government will give a higher priority to the pre-emption and prior detection of one of those appalling weapons of mass destruction being constructed in this country or being brought in from overseas?

Dr. Howells: I can give the right hon. Gentleman that assurance. Our security and intelligence services are alert to that matter. He would not wish me to talk about how that is being approached, but I know from speaking to those agencies and other Ministers that it is a high priority, and he is right to raise the matter.

I am sorry, Sir Nicholas, that there is so much to address that I have not yet got around to rendition. However, I would like to speak about the middle east for a few moments because that matter has been addressed at some length in hon. Members' speeches. Like members of the Committee, I was in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and Ramallah recently—just a few weeks ago—and I am torn about what to read into current events. My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South described them as an earthquake in middle eastern politics. This has been an extraordinary time. In Tel Aviv, I met Mr. Golali, who is possibly the architect of the unilateralist approach, and I am sure the Committee met him too.

I do not feel as gloomy as the Committee does about the possibility of Gaza and the west bank—if we can make progress—reviving their economies and giving their young people the dignity of an opportunity to tap their own potential. That, of course, is what we have to do. As the Committee clearly and vividly discussed, the unilateralist acts have meant a lot of pain for a lot of people, most of whom are Palestinians. I went to see the building of the wall and I saw the wall itself just a few weeks ago. I was amazed by its intrusiveness and by the effect that it is having on people's lives, particularly in Jerusalem.

Let me say one thing, however. We have heard pleas. We have been told that we are not being hard enough on the Israelis and that we are not doing enough. However, when I met Mr. John Jenkins, our consul-general in Jerusalem, he told me that we are the only country that is bothering to follow up consular cases of passport holders who might be married to a Palestinian or living in Jerusalem and who have found themselves indisposed or whose quality of life has deteriorated as a consequence of the wall being built. We are actually the most active country by far in trying to persuade the Israelis that they should not be doing what they are.

I have heard nothing today with which I disagree. What amazes me is that there is not a much fiercer debate in Israel about whether it wants a failing state—a basket case—on its doorstep. That is the real question. My hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn talked about the child playing in the dirt beneath the posters lionising suicide bombers. He is absolutely right: there can be no clearer illustration of the problem.

Having said that—this is the point raised by the hon. Member for New Forest, East—I also made sure that I spoke to some of the old kibbutzniks. I went to a kibbutz on the old Jerusalem road and after a while, very reluctantly and grudgingly, the people there said, "Yes, life is easier since the barrier was built. We don't worry as much." One has to try to understand the politics of the issue and to balance what is going on inside Israel. There has been a fierce debate.

We know that the situation is having an extraordinarily detrimental effect on the west bank and the fledgling Palestinian state. The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling told us of the crazy idea of building a tunnel. We can barely make Eurostar pay, because of the cost of the channel tunnel. In fact, we cannot make it pay, which is the subject of endless financial proposals and schemes. Imagine trying to build a tunnel across to the west bank for 1.5 million people in Gaza. It is absolute madness. I would like a road and a railway to be built. Indeed, I would like the British to build it. I probably should not say that, but we are good at building such things. I am not sure that they should necessarily be handed over to a mighty company from another mighty nation. I suspect that the Palestinians would very much like to see us involved in such a project, which would make life there so much easier. It would be the start of creating a viable economy for their state.

As hon. Members have said, we must get rid of these barriers and the blockades on roads. My hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn explained that there were very few cars on a particular road because it was an Israeli-only road. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South said, those are not the dreams on which Israel was set up. We know what has happened to those dreams. We know about terrorism and its effects on Israel and the Israeli psyche. There must be a better way.

We urge the Israeli Government constantly on the issue. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam asked whether we were being energetic enough; I think we are. Our ambassador in Tel Aviv and our consul general in Jerusalem are as assiduous as any diplomats anywhere in the middle east in putting pressure on the Israelis to reconsider. It is ironic that the greatest ally to have emerged for the Palestinians is the Israeli high court, which has challenged the route of the barrier and the way in which it has reduced to penury so many people and made their lives a misery. The Israeli high court has found in their favour on a number of occasions, and that is an interesting development. It has been said, however, that it is possible that things will go backwards, not forwards, and we have to take that seriously.

Many important points have been raised, but in the few minutes left I want to deal with the question of rendition. It is a great story, of course; newspapers love it. It is a wonderful cosh to smash the Government over the head with. However, as the Committee's report tells us, the threat of terrorism is a huge challenge that affects us all. The Government, like our allies—including the US Administration—have constantly tried to strike a balance between liberty and security. We should never forget that.

I do not know about other Members, but I get few letters about the victims of terrorism. I get a lot of letters from lobbyists for various organisations about the civil rights of suspects. That is quite right; we should be concerned about that. That is what defines us as a civilised country. But we should not forget the victims. The balance is never easy to strike. I do not care what anyone says. We can hear all kinds of facile analyses, but it is never easy to strike the balance, as we have been trying to. We have to preserve our citizens' freedom while preserving them from the terrorists' indiscriminate violence. We need to work together within the rule of law to use every tool at our disposal to deal with the threat of terrorism.

We do not deport or extradite any person to another state where there are substantive grounds to believe that they will face a risk of torture or where the death penalty will be applied. That is difficult in many countries where we have troops on the ground who are trying to defeat terrorism and create better societies. It is not easy.

Condoleezza Rice set out in her statement of 5 December the US attitude to torture. It complies with the UN convention against torture and does not authorise or condone it. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said in response on the same day:

> "We, the EU and the wider international community must be clear on the terrorism threat we face. Modern terrorism means mass casualties as we saw on 11 September and 7 July . . . It is right that democracies should discuss these issues, including the importance of the legal framework, which we all observe. Secretary Rice's reply makes clear that US policy is to comply with the UN Convention Against Torture and, in this respect 'the United States government complies with its Constitution, its laws, and its treaty obligations. Acts of physical or mental torture are expressly prohibited. The United States government does not authorise or condone torture of detainees. Torture, and conspiracy to commit torture, are crimes under US law, wherever they may occur in the world.'"

My right hon. Friend added:

> "the US has 'fully respected the sovereignty' of other countries that co-operate in these matters".

[Dr. Howells]

Finally, I remind the Committee of what the Prime Minister said on 7 December:

"First, let me draw a very clear distinction indeed between the idea of suspects being taken from one country to another and any sense whatever that ourselves, the United States or anyone condones the use of torture. Torture cannot be justified in any set of circumstances at all. The practice of rendition as described by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been American policy for many years. We have not had such a situation here, but that has been American policy for many, many years. However, it must be applied in accordance with international conventions, and I accept entirely Secretary of State Rice's assurance that it has been."—[Official Report, 7 December 2005; Vol. 440, c. 862–3.]

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I have used my discretion in allowing the Minister to finish, as the quote was valuable to the debate. I congratulate the Chamber on an interesting and informed debate.

It being half-past Five o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Probation Service

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Tony Cunningham.]

9.30 am

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): I am grateful to have the opportunity to talk about the future of the probation service. I am not only a strong supporter but a big admirer of it for the difficult work that it does. It has a key role in what the Government describe as the fight against crime, and in building a better society, by working to redeem offenders, to support them so that they do not slip back into the habit offending, and working to sustain former prisoners and offenders as they adjust to society. It is only that adjustment that will stop them reoffending.

The probation service is overstretched, and in my view the staff are underpaid. There are probably 200,000 offenders, a total that is increasing, but the service is ever more successful and effective in dealing with that number. Indeed, over the last few years it has coped with the many new duties that have been thrust upon it—custody plus for instance, introduced by the Criminal Justice Act 2003—all of which has produced what the Home Office estimates will be a 70,000 increase in its case load.

Last year, the probation service supervised 12,600 high-risk offenders. Only 79 of them—0.6 per cent.—had reoffended by the end of that supervision. Its breach targets have been achieved in 92 per cent. of cases, and eight out of 10 supervisory periods have been sustained for six months or more. In other words, it is doing a very good job. It was helped by the reorganisation of 2001, which created a national service. That good reform is working well, and I ask the Minister to tell us why it is now being scrapped. What evaluation has been done of that successful reform? The probation service has adjusted to it, and is working successfully, yet it now has to face another change.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I am sorry to say that I shall not be able to speak in the debate, nor stay until the end.

I pick up on the point that my hon. Friend put to the Minister and suggest that the answer may not be all that helpful. It is not at all obvious whether the 2001 reorganisation has been monitored or evaluated, but it was said that it would deal with fragmentation and limited accountability, both locally and nationally. It has been successful, but here we are introducing more fragmentation, locally and nationally, which will weaken accountability even further. What is the rationale for that?

Mr. Mitchell: I wish I knew. I am no expert in that form of psychology, but my hon. Friend makes a telling point. Nor am I am expert on the reasons for this process of restless change. As soon as something settles in, it is changed without evaluation. That is why I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to tell us what evaluation has been done. Just how bad is the service? He must tell us when winding up. We need to know before we can comment on the new framework. Will it improve matters or not?

It is a process of restless change. Unfortunately, it is not untypical of the Government. We have the blue skies thinker, Lord Birt, in the stratosphere; and we have the grey walls thinker, Lord Carter, who is incarcerated behind the grey walls of the House of Lords. They come up with bright new schemes for changing everything.

We face another bout of change, but is it necessary? It will effectively abolish the national probation service. Indeed, there are indications that the national probation directorate is already being run down. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will deal with that. It will be changed under the proposals set out in the consultation paper "Restructuring Probation to Reduce Re-offending"; I have at least touched it, if not read it in detail. It is another product of the restless process of change. That, too, is typical of the process. Again, none of the views on which the paper is based has been thought through or researched. They are assertions, not demonstrable proof of an ability to remedy failings in the existing system. "If it ain't broke, don't fix it" is a maxim I believe in politics. I think that the Labour party is a more conservative party and that should be our maxim. Why, then, is there this restless change?

The paper argues that contestability is better than local co-operation based on the existing structure; co-operation with the police, the magistrates and the community. On the argument that contestability is vital, a unified service will be replaced by fragmentation into business units, and local co-operation will be replaced by contestability. Contestability must mean value for money and the introduction of the profit motive into this judicial service.

David Taylor: Is not this whole concept of contestability predicated on something that simply is not the case? It assumes that a throng of private businesses eager to manage Britain's offending population can see the market potential of the addicted alcoholic or deviant, mentally confused and otherwise dysfunctional offenders, like the angel imprisoned in a block of marble. They are not my words, but those of Richard Heller, who is not necessarily a friend of the Government but is absolutely hostile to these proposals.

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention, as I too received a letter from Richard Heller, which sets out his views and the experience of his wife, who was in the probation service and who sadly died a few weeks ago. It was a powerful and moving letter, which sums up this case. The ethos must be co-operation and service to the offender, not the profit motive and value for money. Value to society is the ethos, not value for money; the two are not the same. Yet on the basis of that untested, unproven assertion, the 42 local area boards will be abolished. Quite apart from the fact that they will shortly abolish themselves as areas, because of the reorganisation of the police service, which will be completed, one hopes, in two years—another restless change process—new areas will be required for those that presently work for probation.

[Mr. Mitchell]

The area boards will be abolished and replaced by regional business managers, who will invite bids to provide the service from new bodies and contributors; outside organisations. They could be anything; prison companies, charities or cattle prod manufacturers, which also produce tagging devices. The very slogan, "Correction companies" brings to mind sadomasochism of all kinds. One does not know what the organisations will be. Yet, untried organisations will be brought in to replace what is now an effective, well functioning service. They will all be able to bid for contracts to run the service for profit, in local units.

What is wrong with that can be fairly readily summed up; it is an attempt to create an artificial market in probation services, which should not be a market at all. This is a judicial function, a service for the courts and offenders, not a means of profit. What is wrong with the proposal? Probation is part of the judicial system. It is an agency of justice, not an agency of commerce. To make it an agency of commerce must undermine trust and undermine its integrity. Judge Judge—"Here come da judge, judge"—has pointed out the unsuitability of bringing commerce into this function. It will not only undermine trust but produce obvious conflicts of interest.

One pictures the scene. A probation officer appears in court to make his recommendations. He recommends that the offender be committed to lag's hall, which is run by his group, group 69, to provide correctional services, and he offers the court a DVD presentation of its charms and attractions. It will be exciting stuff; visual displays of the sort of place to which the offender will be sent.

Perhaps the probation officer could recommend tagging; his company McTag-it, which is based in Scotland and can produce red tags that are approved by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, can be worn with any clothing, and will keep the offender under effective supervision.

Perhaps, on the other hand, the probation officer could recommend community service and say that, just by coincidence, his company, Charitable Drains R Us, provides useful work digging drains for churches, public toilets and other places in which offenders can usefully be employed.

David Taylor: I am not sure that I can intervene effectively at this point, but surely they have tartan tags north of the border. My hon. Friend makes these places sound as attractive as Grimsby without street lights. Does he agree that there is a market to tag, to survey and to incarcerate offenders, but that there is no business to reform them, which is the problem? The performance indicators for reform will not respond to the conventional levers of the usual market.

Mr. Mitchell: Again, apart from his point about Grimsby, my hon. Friend hits the nail on the head, and I am grateful to him for hitting all the nails that I have left standing in my harangue.

The scrapping of the reorganisation of the service is an invitation to create conflicts of interest, as I said. It is also an end to community co-operation, because the boards in effect manage community co-operation. Will a commercial organisation do that? I doubt it. The Home Office says that it will create a vibrant mixed economy in probation services locally. That is the sort of nonsense that Ministers talk when they have nothing to say.

The probation trusts will be run by businessmen who will not be able to secure local co-operation, and will not include magistrates, as the current bodies do. They will not have the same roots in the community. Their roots will be in profit and value for money. That is a deeply unattractive picture, because there will be fear, uncertainty, and a feeling of betrayal in the probation service, whose work the Government should be praising and encouraging. They should be inspecting it, too, but they should praise and encourage it because it has been so successful. Saying that it works well does not mean that it cannot be improved, but everyone agrees that it is improving. The proposal, however, is the reward that it is being given for making those efforts to improve.

The picture is so unattractive that I hope that the Minister has noticed that Scotland, the land of Rebus and substantial crime levels, has rejected the proposal in favour of community co-operation made statutory. We could and should do the same. I should add that the National Assembly for Wales does not want a bar of the proposal.

My hon. Friend the Minister has wide experience of custodial institutions; I understand that she went to Cheltenham ladies college, the potting shed of the English rose. She also has a history of violence. In exchanges about the shortening of the hours of Parliament, she threatened to break my arm. I have not told anyone that before apart from my wife, who was deeply hurt; she said that if anyone was going to break my arm for not voting for the proposals, it would be her, not the Minister. The Minister comes from that background, so why are we leaping in the dark? Surely it is not the ethos of Cheltenham ladies college to go leaping in the dark. That sounds very reprehensible.

Why are the Government opting for an untried, untested pot-pourri of confusing theories based on business efficiency? Why do they not build on the service's steady improvement instead of abandoning it? Why are they going for an untested, untried model?

The regulatory impact assessment that was published on 1 November is a disgrace to any Government that is concerned with the efficiency of the service. It is required for public consultation, but no bank would lend money on the quantifiable aspects of it. It is the shabbiest regulatory impact assessment that I have ever seen. It asserts that there will be efficiency savings of between 3 per cent. and 8.5 per cent. Where? How? It says that it will cut costs and will save £625 million. Where? How? What is the proof? Where will that saving come from? Consider the history of the private sector in saving money for the Home Office. Morrisons took over the hostels that the probation service uses and the costs have gone up by 62 per cent., yet we are told that there will be a saving from this change. The private sector also took over the management of probation premises. Their costs are up 35 per cent.

The Home Office has no experience, no effectiveness and no skill in dealing with the private sector; consider the inordinate profits being made by the tagging companies out of a fairly minor and easy-to-run area of business. What investment will be made in training under the new system? Will the emphasis be purely on profits? One cannot calculate a rate of return on a community service that is dealing with redemption; as opposed to saving people's souls, it is saving their futures in a society in which there are successes and failures. Some things are tough to achieve, and it is impossible to calculate a return rate on that kind of service, but the Government propose to do exactly that.

David Taylor: Is it not the case that probation officers, understandably, feel that their role is changing from agents of justice to pawns of commerce? It is tragic that that is happening in the hundredth year of their profession. We should be celebrating their successes, not waving goodbye to them in such a calculated way.

Mr. Mitchell: Were it not so tragic, it would be laughable, particularly because it is proposed on an intellectual basis. One cannot build a structure on a foundation as shabby as the thinking in the regulatory impact assessment. No business case has been made, so far as I can see. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us. Is there a business case for this, or is it all seat of the pants stuff? Admittedly, the seat of the Home Secretary's pants is a capacious area, but if we are flying by it there has to be demonstrable support, and we need demonstrable figures to give us faith in what has been decided. All that we have is the assertion that it will cut the rate of offending by 5 per cent. That is ridiculous. Will it do so? I very much doubt it. What careful research has gone into the assessment? I hope that the Minister will try to justify it.

In conclusion, I urge the Minister not to undermine a service that is doing wonderful work. It is much improved and has adjusted successfully to the reforms imposed on it only four years ago. Its officers are servants of society and of the judicial system; they are working well with the police, the magistrates and the community. She must not put all that at risk by implementing untried, untested theories about commercial motivation, so I urge her to put redemption at the centre, not profit.

9.50 am

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on securing the debate. I have lost count of how many times we have debated this issue; it could be the fourth or fifth—

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The sixth.

John McDonnell: My hon. Friend says that this is the sixth occasion.

A number of years ago, we had a rational debate about how to reform the probation and prison services, integrated sentences, assessments and whatever support was required to ensure that offenders never reoffended. We also discussed how those things could be linked holistically with local authorities, social services departments and, in many instances, local primary care trusts to see what health care and other support was provided to offenders and their families.

That rational debate was led by the professionals in the field, including judges, magistrates and others in the judicial system. We also engaged with the police, prison officers and the probation service. Leading up to 2001, we were perhaps engaged in one of the most productive, rational debates on the issue for decades. It was a cross-party discussion, and a range of views were expressed about the service's performance up to that point and how we could improve it. That evidence-based discussion reflected the long experience of those in the service—as has been mentioned, the 100th anniversary is coming up—but it was also based on unemotional but committed discussion of how we served our community.

That is how the last reorganisation came about in 2001. We put together the national probation service and set up the national probation directorate. We were all committed to a multi-agency approach to tackling the problem of reoffending and to ensuring that the service was adequately resourced and based on professional, well-trained staff who were secure in the knowledge that they had the Government's support in the difficult task that they had to undertake.

That was the rational debate. What we have had since then would be farcical if, as my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby rightly said, the issue were not so serious. The Government have introduced half-baked proposals that have not been thought through and have launched new services almost monthly. I do not know how many times we have had press releases and press events to announce the launch of the National Offender Management Service. Staff have been appointed on fairly high salaries before legislation has even been passed to enable the service to be brought into operation. Services have been distributed around the country and given bizarre titles, from NOMS to ROMS to whatever.

For some reason, the process in which we engaged from 1997 to 2001 was abandoned and we went into a headlong rush, but towards what? Let us call it what it is: it is not contestability or best value that the Government have in mind, but straightforward privatisation. Probation officers and prison officers know what is coming at the end of the day. No matter how the Government dress things up and no matter what reasons they give regarding improvements to the service, we have not, as my hon. Friend said, seen any detailed analysis of the system as it now operates. We have seen no detailed research that has been accepted by the professionals in the field or by independent observers of how the system established in 2001 has operated. That is what is so disappointing about the Government's performance, and it is becoming an increasing source of anger and anguish among professionals who see the Government's proposals undermining their service.

I welcome the Home Secretary's recent publication—provided that the consultation is genuine. If it is, and we listen to the professionals in the field, we will return to a proposal based on co-operation and, as my hon. Friend said, largely on the Welsh or the Scottish model. That is a multi-agency approach that embodies local accountability and involves the people who deliver at the sharp end.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that despite nearly 100 years of splendid service to our local communities the probation service is too often seen as the ugly sister in the criminal justice system? It has been hugely overlooked, and the present uncertainty and confusion can only add to the demoralisation of probation officers who are doing their best in difficult circumstances.

John McDonnell: I know that it is nearing Christmas, but I was trying to avoid as many pantomime references as I could. They are tempting, I know. I thought that the 2001 restructuring was the first step in acknowledging the significance of the role of the probation services. That is why I welcomed it. I agree that there is concern that for too long the role of the probation service has not been acknowledged and in some instances funding has not been allocated in a way that recognises the significance of that role. The 2001 restructuring addressed that to a certain extent.

In London, in particular, we went through a number of budgetary crises on an annual basis, almost like a hardy perennial, but that is now being addressed as a result of the recognition of the importance of the service. That is why we are disconcerted that that rational approach, which recognised the importance of the service, examined the need for additional resources and gained them, and recognised that we should be listening to the professionals on the front line, seems to have gone out of the window, as a result of the Government's obsession with competition and their dogmatic approach that the best way to improve services is through competition and the best way to achieve competition through privatisation.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend referred to pantomimes. In a similar context, is this not an extreme example of the Alice in Wonderland idea of verdict first and trial later? We have had discussions about the probation service and NOMS in which the dialogue between those who are concerned about the lack of a business plan and the sundry Ministers could have been scripted by Samuel Beckett. We were always waiting for a marvellous business plan, until one one day appeared as some under-nourished, pathetic and ill-argued screen on the Home Office website. That is not the sort of business plan that we had in mind, and is that not at the heart of the problems we face?

John McDonnell: The number of our debates reflects the lack of available information and evidence provided to Members and therefore the number of times that Members have had to call for such debates to try to extract some information from Government on the rationale for their approach. Every time we have had the debate we have exposed the fact that there is no rationale except the privatisation of the service.

I have considered the evidence provided to the Select Committee via the various professional groups that provide the service on the ground. I speak as secretary of the justice unions group. We have been meeting on a cross-party basis for nearly two years and meeting the professional providers of the service from the probation service, the Prison Officers Association and the voluntary sector to discuss the issues that they face on the ground and the reforms that they require. None supports the approach that is being taken. It is interesting what a bashing the Select Committee's evidence gives the Government's overall approach. At the same time, it is interesting that the Government are still doggedly pursuing privatisation.

If our approach were rational, we would assess the performance of the probation service. I note from evidence provided to the Select Committee that it is performing better than ever in its history. Figures for November show that breach targets were achieved in 80 per cent. of cases, orders completed in 70 per cent. of cases and offender behaviour programmes completed by 91 per cent. of targeted cases. In addition, eight out of 10 supervisees were still in contact with their probation officer after six months' supervision, and 93 per cent. of victims were contacted within the required period. That is not a system that is imploding or failing. It is a system that, as a result of Government restructuring in 2001, additional resources and professional direction is succeeding exceptionally well. I pay tribute to the service providers themselves, the probation and prison officers who are working so hard.

The Government's proposal is about privatisation. What is that motivated by? Profit-making, of course. How do people make profits in a public service or in any service, but particularly in a privatisation? They sweat the assets. How do they do that? The first asset is the work force, so pay and conditions are reduced. Where privatisation has occurred within the prison service, salary levels have been reduced. The average pay rates for prison officers are 51 per cent. greater than for their private sector counterparts. We see a reduction in pay rates overall. When one adds the value of pensions and holiday benefits to that, there can be a difference in rates of up to 70 per cent.

Mr. Mitchell: The difference in pay rates between private and public prisons leads to a far greater turnover in the staff at the privatised prisons. That must be bad for the service. If that develops in the probation service, it will be even worse for offenders.

John McDonnell: My hon. Friend is right. Turnover rates are sometimes 10 times greater in private prisons than in public prisons. At the moment, a probation officer is trained for two years, in service and in various correspondence courses and additional course support. With those turnover rates, we would be left with a de-professionalised probation service. We would be left with a large number of staff who were untrained or undergoing training and never completing it. We would de-professionalise the service. There is no commitment from the private sector to stay the course over a two-year training programme to ensure that staff are adequately trained. I fear that the private sector will cream off the profits, and it will be left to the public service to invest in training to ensure that we have at least a core of trained staff providing the service itself.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby also mentioned how costs have increased dramatically where elements of the probation service have been privatised. Under the Morrisons contract, costs rose by 62 per cent. That is not making profits, but profiteering at the expense of the public sector. When we had this debate more than a year ago, it was not just about the increase in costs of 35 per cent., but about the lunacies and inadequacies of the management of premises. There were classic examples of how many private sector staff it took to change a light bulb in one of those establishments. Bizarrely, staff were sent more than 100 miles for a simple maintenance operation.

The other issue that has been mentioned—lack of independence in the privatised probation service—will undermine confidence in the service. When profit becomes the motive, independence of judgment is often driven out, as we have seen in other private sector operations and in other privatisations. No matter how good the probation officers are at their job, no matter how committed they are, they will come under private sector pressure to maintain and maximise profits rather than to fulfil the role that they would have had in the public sector.

The issue of local accountability is increasingly worrying. Local authorities will be inadequately represented on local trusts or boards. There will be no requirement for judges or even magistrates to be represented. That breaks a link between the provision of justice and local views and attitudes that we have had for nearly 500 years. The link between local magistrates and how offenders are dealt with in their local area will be broken.

The Government have prayed in aid the role of the voluntary sector. We have met with the voluntary sector throughout the process. It has the same fears as probation officers that they will be squeezed out of the system by the nature of the contracts that will be awarded to the private sector, that they will not have the resources to be able to compete and that they will come under pressure to provide services in a way that they do not feel appropriate, given their role to date. As much as probation officers themselves, the voluntary sector fears for the future of the service, and it is equally dedicated to maintaining the service in the public sector.

I urge the Government to think again even at this late stage. Let us consult our colleagues in Scotland and Wales on how the multi-agency approach is bedding down and operating there. Let us have further consultation with the staff through their trade unions to ensure that we establish a service based on what the professionals tell us about what is needed, including the necessary investment and how the service best operates in the public sector, co-operating with the voluntary sector, to achieve the best results.

I fear for the future of the service. I feel that we are throwing out a 100-year tradition that has served this country well. Of course there have been mistakes in the past, but there have been mistakes in all services. I warn the House that if we privatise this service, we will not have seen anything yet. There will be a backlash against the proposals if they are implemented in our communities, given that the private sector fails those communities when it comes to securing justice, peace, security and the end of reoffending. I shall encourage as many hon. Members as possible to vote against proposals if legislation is ever introduced in the House. I also give this commitment: if these iniquitous proposals provoke industrial action among probation officers or prison officers, I will join them on the picket lines to oppose them.

10.6 am

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) for introducing the debate. In the light of the consultation paper that came out recently, it is important that we have this debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) says that we have had six debates on the National Offender Management Service. We have certainly had five or six, but one thing that has been true of all the debates is that they have taken place in Westminster Hall. What we have not had, and what we should have had, on the proposed major restructuring of the service is a debate in the main Chamber of the House of Commons.

I suspect that one consequence of having the debates as Adjournment debates in Westminster Hall is that quite a number of hon. Members are not fully aware of what is happening and what is proposed. When they do find out, the Government will find that there is considerable opposition to what is happening. Previously, when a major rally was held in Central Hall Westminster by the probation officers' union—the National Association of Probation Officers—many hon. Members were contacted by their local probation services and they then gave clear support to those services in what they were saying. Exactly the same thing will happen if a Bill is introduced in the new year and we have a debate in the main Chamber of the House of Commons.

As has been said, it is difficult to understand the rationale for what is happening. We are dealing with a service that was reorganised only in 2001. Among the major reasons that the Government gave at that time for the reorganisation and the creation of the national probation service was that the existing structures were fragmented and unaccountable. That was the argument for creating the present structure. The consultation paper issued before the 2001 reorganisation talked about having too many autonomous units free to deploy resources from central Government, limited accountability and a lack of democratic accountability at local level. It was also argued that fragmentation inhibited efficiency and did not provide value for money.

Having said all that in 2001 and created the national service, the Government now seem to be going in exactly the opposite direction. One would assume that if a service had been restructured in 2001 and it was thought necessary four years later to come back and do something else, there would be shoals of evidence for the failure of the 2001 restructuring, and of the service not having performed or delivered. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington pointed out, all the statistics say that the probation service is performing better than it has for many years. If that is happening, what is the rationale behind tearing up the structure that has been in existence for only four years?

During those four years, many other changes have happened, which have had to be coped with. The Criminal Justice Act 2003 changed sentencing, with community sentences and the new custodial sentences, and that has added a considerable amount to the probation case load. Even so, there is no evidence that the probation service has not met all its targets. In the most recently published report, the national probation directorate said that the results were better than at any stage since the national probation service was created, and they were expected to get better still.

[Mr. Neil Gerrard]

Nobody is suggesting that everything that needs to be done to deal with offenders has to be done by the probation service. There is already co-operative work going on, involving the voluntary, not-for-profit sector. Many of the current drugs rehabilitation projects are run through voluntary sector organisations. However, if we go down the road of contestability, it will be a problem not only for the probation service, but for the voluntary, not-for-profit sector, which will be in the same business of facing risks, and needing spare capacity to make bids. Some smaller voluntary sector organisations have told us that they are concerned that, after the changes that are now envisaged, they will be squeezed out of work that they can currently do with local probation wards and services.

Nobody is arguing that there should not be a multi-agency approach; nobody has a problem with the idea of partnership between a range of statutory and voluntary organisations. Nobody has any difficulties with that. However, the issue of contestability destroys that co-operative working, and some of the arguments that have been advanced about the need to bring in privatisation—because that is what it is—have cited what has happened in the Prison Service, and have argued that the effect of privatisation in the Prison Service has been to drive up standards. If one looks at where privatisation has happened in prison administration in the last 10 to 15 years, the private sector has only ever had brand new prisons to manage. It has never had to face dealing with Victorian prisons with serious overcrowding, or with the prisons that have had the biggest problems. It is the public sector that has raised the standards in prisons with the most serious problems, not the private sector. By and large, the private sector has had the easy bits of the Prison Service to deal with.

John McDonnell: There are now examples of the private sector confronting a problem that it is unable to deal with, and then bringing in the public sector to handle it. I give the example in my constituency of Harmondsworth detention centre, where there was a major riot with an associated fire. It was the private sector that withdrew, and public sector workers—Prison Officers Association members—then had to deal with the problem.

Mr. Gerrard: That is a common pattern. Public sector services are being privatised and when things go wrong, it is almost always in the end the public sector that ends up picking up the tab and dealing with the problem. I shall say a word or two about the latest consultation paper—the paper that was issued recently, entitled "Restructuring Probation to Reduce Reoffending." The use of that title makes the assertion and assumption that restructuring probation is necessary to reduce reoffending. A number of issues arise from that consultation paper. I am sure that other hon. Members will have seen the response to the consultation made by the Probation Boards Association, the national body that represents the local probation boards, which are currently the employers of probation staff. Incidentally, that raises another issue; if we go down the road of contestability, who will be the employers of the current probation staff?

The probation boards welcomed quite a bit of what the Government said earlier: they welcomed the idea of putting the prevention of reoffending at the centre of what they do and the idea of packages of support and intervention for every offender. No one has issues with such aims and objectives. However, they point out that although the consultation paper has been issued, the Cabinet Office code of practice is not being followed. That is acknowledged in the introduction to the consultation paper—the argument made for not following the code is that the 12-week consultation period is not needed because "we have conducted previous consultation exercises on the National Offender Management Service and are now hoping to introduce the legislation needed to give effect to these proposals as soon as possible."

However, as the Probation Boards Association points out, a significant change is being proposed, and the document returns to some issues that we thought had gone away.

It was only in July last year that the then Minister for Prisons and Probation concluded that we should keep the existing probation boards, at least for the foreseeable future. We all thought at the time that that meant that the probation boards would stay for some time but, a year and a bit later, we are back again discussing the suggestion that the 42 probation boards will be abolished. As we have all been saying in this debate, the overriding test that should be applied is: how will these changes have a positive impact on the degree of reoffending and why, and what is the evidence that they will do so?

If we dismantle the probation boards as suggested, that will remove the local links that exist—it will disengage local communities, the local judiciary and police forces from those links. In the present structure there is coterminosity of services and, particularly since the restructuring of some police services is under discussion, one would have thought that this matter might be better left alone until some of those decisions have been made.

It seems to me that the proposals threaten an end to publicly provided probation services in the form in which we have known them. I think that if the Government introduce legislation to abolish the probation boards and to restructure the probation services, they will find that many more hon. Members will be interested and concerned about that issue than are present this morning. That is what happened the last time that this issue was raised at a national level.

I hope that before we go too far down this road we will stop and think again and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington said, listen to what the professionals—the people who work in the service, who deliver the service on the ground and who run the service through the probation boards—are actually saying, because none of those people supports the proposals. I urge Ministers to think again about the route that they are taking.

10.19 am

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): I am delighted to be able to make a brief contribution. I am moved to do so by two things: by the tour de force of my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), and by the fact that I have always had a high regard for the Minister, about whose educational background I know more, thanks to my hon. Friend, than I did at the start of the debate.

The Home Office has form on this issue: the Government have suggested in recent times that forensic science and young offenders' institutions should be opened up to market contestability. But it stepped back slightly on those fields of endeavour, and I hope they will do so in respect of the probation service.

I repeat the question that I asked my hon. Friend the Minister last week at Home Office questions, which she may remember: do the Government think that any part of the management and apprehension of offenders has such a strong public service element that it should not be open to contestability and marketisation? I paraphrase my hon. Friend's reply, which was that as long as there was a public service element in the provision, she was indifferent about who was the provider.

There must come a point at which the public service element of something is so strong that all parties recoil from its being provided by a private company. I hope the Home Office would rule out plans for market contestability in the case of a magistrates clerk, a judge or a police officer, and the probation service is not very far from those core elements of our judicial system that have such a strong public service element. That there is not a well developed market and a rush of private providers coming forward to manage offenders suggests that there are some things in which the public service element is so strong that that is where the line should be drawn.

Across Government, the only model being provided is of the public sector being a commissioner and being indifferent to who the provider is, but time and again Ministers have to step back because of opposition, as they have had to do as a result of the situation in primary care trusts in the health service. I hope that my hon. Friend will do the same in respect of the probation service.

I want to add a little more force to some of the points made by other hon. Members. It could be said that the broad issue has been subject to consultation before, and the Government's defence is that a 12-week consultation period is therefore unnecessary, but these proposals are so radically different from anything that has been consulted on before that it would have shown a measure of good faith to have had a full, 12-week consultation.

In north Yorkshire, it is feared that there will no longer be a locally commissioned service and that what we have will be decided by regional or national bureaucrats. People are worried that there will be no local community or judicial input in the remaining local boards and trusts and that input will come mainly from business.

I shall be fascinated to hear what the two Opposition parties say about the politics of the proposal. If they announced that they would oppose the marketisation and privatisation of the probation service, they would kill the proposal and provide a great public service.

From my humble position on the Back Benches, which is likely to be permanent, I say to my hon. Friend that there are two ways to be a junior Minister: you can either keep your head down, carry out the brief and take instructions from whichever bright young thing happens to be in No. 10 Downing street, or you can exercise some political judgment. That is what I hope the Home Office has done in respect of the forensic science service, although I am not quite sure; I trust that it is pausing for reflection.

I have enough regard for the Minister to believe that she will not get into a political situation in which the Labour Government carry large numbers of measures only with support from the majority Opposition party, but that is her only hope of getting measures on this matter through the House. I hope that such is the descriptive potential of the proposal, and such is the feeling that a line must be drawn somewhere between the public and the private sector, that the Opposition parties will say today that they oppose it. I also hope that my hon. Friend will stage a stylish and managed retreat.

10.25 am

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on securing the debate. His instinct for the ethos of girls' public sch[illegible]s surprisingly spot-on. Cheltenham ladies college is, of course, in my constituency, and I can tell him that the researcher, Elizabeth Poston, who prepared me for this debate, was recently at that college and is just as alarmed as he is by some of the proposals. Perhaps the Minister is out of kilter on this issue.

I do not doubt the Government's sincerity in wanting to reduce reoffending and crime, which are critical issues, but that makes it even more important and critical that we get this right. The Government's proposals run the risk of making some of the classic errors of new Labour projects, such as seeking solutions in restructuring rather than in quality of work. Other examples include their short-termism, their naivety about business—I say that as someone who has a background in both business and the voluntary sector—and their instinct for centralisation or, at the very least, delocalisation.

I shall take those issues one by one. First, I shall address the practice of seeking solutions in reorganisation. I made this point in a surprisingly similar debate on police restructuring. Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary was supposedly there to improve the performance of constabularies, yet the solution appeared instead to be in restructuring. Similarly, the probation service has Her Majesty's inspectorate of probation, the purpose of which—in case the Minister has forgotten—includes contributing to improved performance in the NPS, NOMS and youth offending teams, and contributing to sound policy and effective service delivery by providing advice. Perhaps the Minister can tell us: has HMIP so failed in that duty that we have to abolish the existing probation service, or has it recommended the change? I know that the Carter report suggested it, but has there been any recommendation from the inspectorate that these changes should take place? I trawled its website this morning and found no such recommendation.

There are better ways to try to improve reoffending rates, such as the better enforcement of licences, making sure that breaches in community service orders are more rigorously pursued and better education. The

[Martin Horwood]

National Audit Office recently delved into the area of reoffending, and it, too, failed to recommend any kind of restructuring on this scale, but recommended considering education. It said that it is clear that overcrowding in prisons is disrupting attempts at reducing reoffending through education, and recommended shorter modular education courses that can be standardised across establishments to minimise disruption. It also suggested arranging for relevant education records to be transferred when a prisoner is moved, or introducing evening or weekend courses in local prisons to increase learning opportunities for prisoners. We know that the high level of functional illiteracy and lack of numeracy among prisoners contributes to reoffending. The NAO accepts that link, yet we are not giving time for its recommendations to be accepted and acted on. Therefore, we are rushing into a restructuring solution.

The social exclusion unit—another Government body—has identified housing stability as an important issue in patterns of reoffending. There is the possibility of looking at more joined-up operations without this kind of restructuring between youth offending teams, the police, the National Offender Management Service, local authorities, and voluntary sector services such as drug rehabilitation services. There are even simple solutions such as the branding and presentation of information and the way in which services are presented, and the recent example of community service teams being rebranded as community payback teams, which is welcome, I suppose, if it is about trying to emphasise the importance of the victim's role in community rehabilitation and community service provision. There are lots of things that the Government could consider, but they have opted instead for a structural solution, as they are doing with the police. There is an equal chance that that may go wrong.

The second issue that I shall address is short-termism. Many hon. Members have mentioned that the probation service in its current form was put in place as recently as 2001; indeed, NOMS was set up only last year. We have the model of the health service in which primary care groups were set up and were, in theory, being piloted, but were abolished before they had even finished their pilots. We then had the primary care trusts, which were established only in 2001, but they are now being abolished and restructured on a grand scale. The Countryside Agency was set up and abolished by the same Government. We have the repeated terrorist legislation—every time there is a major atrocity we seem to produce fresh anti-terrorism legislation urgently. The Government's knee-jerk reaction is to attempt to tackle each new alarming set of statistics or findings through restructuring or new legislation. Instead, they should allow the reforms that they have already introduced, and which we may support in many respects, the time to bed in. They should wait to see whether those reforms are working and then evaluate them properly. Several hon. Members have mentioned lack of evaluation.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I a[illegible] my hon. Friend the Member for Grea[illegible] (Mr. Mitchell) and to other hon. Members [illegible] the early part of the debate.

The regulatory impact assessment, which I am sure the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood) has read, says that the restructuring of the probation service is a positive move. Does he agree that, when one picks away at it, the regulatory impact assessment does not say clearly why it is a positive move and why there will be cost savings?

Martin Horwood: The hon. Gentleman makes a valuable point. The lack of thorough evaluation is a major factor.

My third point concerns new Labour's naivety in business. It has a breathless enthusiasm for business terminology. We have heard the Home Secretary's comment about the "vibrant mixed economy", as if that were appropriate for a probation service. There is a statement in "Restructuring Probation to Reduce Re-offending" about winning business from the Secretary of State. One can almost sense his enthusiasm for playing big business.

I have a business background, and markets operate well where clear consumer pressure operates. Consumer markets operate on several different levels. They operate not only on price, but on people's experience of the product, on their perceptions of quality, on brand loyalty and, these days, on the ethics of the product. Without those consumer pressures, markets are reduced to being about contracts for price. Cost becomes the only significant factor.

Similarly, pseudo-markets in the NHS or the railways have not really operated as the Government expected them to because an individual passenger or patient cannot choose a particular rail company at a particular moment. They must take the train to London that turns up on the platform, just as they must be treated in the accident and emergency department to which they are sent. They do not have consumer choice in that sense. Likewise, offenders and victims will not be able to choose another probation service provider when they come to use the service or attempt to influence it.

This is a pseudo-market; it is not a market in the true sense. The market will not operate in the way in which the Government expect it to. I am not ideologically committed to state provision, but the business approach is not always right. Each case needs careful evaluation and thought.

As the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) pointed out, even in business some core competencies are not outsourced. One must ask what the Government's core competencies are. The probation service would seem to me to be pretty close to being a core competency. Moreover, a new business approach would not be launched without a robust business plan and without plenty of evaluation having been undertaken. I have known plenty of large companies that would spend 10 years evaluating a new product or approach before launching it on the market. The Government could learn something from such an approach.

Finally, on centralisation, which I would call "de-localisation", my constituency is facing less-local hospital children's services and planning powers and a less-local ambulance trust, fire control centre, police force and primary care trust. We even face a less-local strategic health authority, and the probation service is now to be added to that list. In the end, the provision of probation services in my constituency will depend on the whim of the Secretary of State. Either it is a huge coincidence that all the evidence about all those different services happens to point in the same direction or some other underlying reason is behind the Government's rush to de-localise services. That reason may be more about saving money.

Hon. Members and the National Association of Probation Officers have listed many practical problems. A conflict of interest arises when private companies advise courts on sentences and parole decisions, because those companies must weigh up their commercial interest and a duty to their shareholders against the public interest. There is the problem of sensitive personal data on offenders and victims being handed to multiple data processors. There is an impact on youth offending teams, on police and on local social services, which may need to deal with multiple providers of probation services in their area. We must also consider the impact of the different cultures of the police and probation service within the National Offender Management Service, which has not yet had time to bed in.

There is an overall recurring theme of restructuring, rather than examination of the underlying problems and attempts to improve the quality of work. There is short-termism in restructuring before proper evaluation. There is naivety about business provision and business terminology, and there is delocalisation.

In Scotland, in coalition with the Liberal Democrats, Labour has had to find a different approach. After much careful thought, a different route has been taken. I suggest to the Minister that, instead of risking more crime and, possibly, more lost lives, she and her Government should, for once, think again, take time, take advice and take the right decision.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): It is a great pleasure to congratulate the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on securing this debate. He said what a good job the probation service had done, and he provided evidence to support that. That has been a consistent theme this morning; my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) agreed with him, and so do I. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby remarked on the process of relentless change based on assertions without evidence, which seems to be the underlying motor of the changes that are proposed to the probation service. I was amused by his flights of fancy on the meaning of correctional services. I should report, for the record, that the hon. Gentleman is wearing red socks, if not a red tag.

I shall not take too much time because there is a history of Ministers not fully addressing the issues in answer to hon. Members who speak. The hon. Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) remarked on 6 April that, during an earlier debate secured by the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), concerns were not adequately addressed by the Minister. My hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) remarked that a letter dated 24 March 2005 did not fully answer all the questions raised in a debate on 16 March. Those are two examples; one in which a Minister had not been able to answer during the debate, and another in which a Minister was not able to answer in writing after the debate.

It is worth noting that, in the previous debate that took place on this matter, the Minister spoke for seven columns in Hansard, and only in the fifth column did he begin to address the points made by the hon. Member for Crosby. I cannot say whether this applies to the Under-Secretary, but some Ministers seem to take up too much time with bland and uncontroversial reiteration and never get on to the meat of the matter. That is why I do not propose to spend too much time on my remarks.

There are a number of issues to address, the most consistent of which, in previous debates, has been the disfranchisement of those who work for the probation service and the failure to adequately consult before implementing changes proposed by the Government. I shall not repeat those details, which were adequately set out on 6 April. However, despite ministerial promises of flexibility, the results of consultation always seem to end up much as they start.

I conclude that, regardless of responses from Ministers—among them the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), who said that integration was best achieved at regional and local level—not all Ministers have enough clout to dissuade the national offender management system or civil servants from following a course that has been predetermined, presumably, somewhere further up the line. The hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) suggested that bright young things in No. 10 may be responsible for that. There will be brighter young things in No. 10 in the very near future, but I am sure that they will take much more account of the requirements and wishes of those who work in or are served by the public service.

Something about the consultation that surprised me was a letter of 7 November from the director of probation at the national probation service to NPS chief officers and chairs and national probation directorate regional managers, which told them:

> "I am writing to you formally to remind you of your responsibilities in your roles as statutory office holders".

The letter continued:

> "You should not engage in lobbying activity, you must not promulgate misinformation (e.g. contestability is privatisation) and you should avoid any action that might suggest that you are encouraging staff to lobby against government policy."

Thos instructions are being given to those who know most about the operation of the probation service. The Minister has some explaining to do about why it is unacceptable for those who know most to criticise the Government's policy on restructuring the probation service, when the Home Secretary invited those who know most to criticise the Opposition's policy on sentencing.

Promises have been sought in the past, and many either have not been given or have been given in such a form that they are not reliable. One of the most significant is the one about commissioning at local, not regional, level. Baroness Scotland recently put out a press release announcing that the measures outlined today would transfer the duty to provide probation services to the Home Secretary. He would then assign to national and regional offender managers, acting on his behalf, the task of contracting with a range of providers—public, private or voluntary and community for the supply of probation services. There seems to be complete confusion between the expectations that Ministers—not least a former Home Secretary—have repeated time and again, that the service will be a local one, and statements now coming from the Home Office that it will be regional and national. Unless we get clarity over the way in which the service will be provided, no one will trust it.

A second area on which more information is needed is the timetable for the remaining contestability. Of course we need some of the changes, because prisons do not plug in with probation services, because people are released from prison half way through courses and because there is churning of prisoners, who are moved from one prison to another regardless. I was on the Education Committee and I saw exactly the same kind of things as those for which the National Audit Office has provided evidence. However, although I incline to favour contestability in privatisation, the Minister must concede that the explanations of why it is the right solution in the present case are unconvincing.

Finally, I should like the Minister to say more about evaluation. It is evident that inadequate evaluation has been carried out. Indeed, the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) cited the restructuring that took place in 2001. He said that it was designed to prevent fragmentation and to promote localism, yet there has been no evaluation of that restructuring to say "Yes, it works" or "No, it doesn't work". Instead, as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby said, someone behind the grey walls of another place seems to be committed to a national structure.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) said, we will support the Government when they are doing what is right. If and when we get the opportunity—I should still like to know when that will be—we would have no concern about voting for a well-worked out Bill that proposed a sensible solution. As I said, market testing can be effective, and contestability can drive standards up as well as, or instead of, driving cost. down. However, there is no evidence for the cost savings that are said to be the consequence of the proposal.

The Government do not seem to have settled on their arguments. Even when they are doing what is right, we cannot support them if they are doing it in such a ham-fisted way. That is not to say that the situation is irretrievable. It is retrievable if the Minister listens to what is being said by hon. Members on both sides. I hope that she will listen and, more important, I hope that she will answer.

10.45 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I have written on my notes, "I would like to congratulate my hon. Friend", meaning the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). I sometimes wonder whether I really want to congratulate that person. I do now, because I am glad that we have been able to discuss such an important issue. However, do I thank that person for giving hon. Members on both sides the opportunity to patronise me, especially about where I went to school? No, not particularly. However, we have had a real insight into the views of the different political parties on the fundamental role of the probation service, which is to protect the public and to reduce reoffending.

My hon. Friends seem concerned that we should build on, maintain and preserve the progress that the probation service has made to date. The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood) muddled me; he seemed keen to praise such initiatives as community payback but then railed against the Government for delocalising services. Nevertheless, every contribution to the debate has rightly emphasised the importance of the reform of probation in 2001, which led to a national probation service and drove up standards.

I join in the congratulations that many hon. Members have expressed on the service's progress in enforcement. Some 43 per cent. of sentences were enforced in 2001; the figure is now than 92 per cent. Such progress is important, although where we started from was in some ways depressing.

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), who represents the official Opposition, gave us an insight into how they plan to deal with their policy vacuum; they will not say what they think but instead will try to stir it to see whether that helps. They are doing so by discussing the role of Ministers rather than their policies. It was entertaining, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I would prefer to deal with the issues raised by my hon. Friends; what are we trying to do, why are we not building on the achievements made to date, and will it break the system?

We set out clearly what we wanted to achieve in the Carter report. The objective of reducing reoffending is not particularly controversial. We want to achieve it by giving an offender manager the clear role of managing the sentence of an offender; and that should be backed up by intervention.

It is striking that we have invested to deliver that. The improvements that hon. Members referred to were achieved because we made resources available. In 1997, the probation budget was £439 million. At that time, the enforcement target was met in less than half the number of cases. The budget for the current year is £874 million, a real-terms increase of 55 per cent, and the number of staff has increased from 14,000 to 20,000. I give those figures because, among other things, I want to make it clear to my hon. Friends that we do not intend to chuck the service out with the bath water, as they imply. Nor do we seek to make massive savings. Our concern is to ensure that the improvements that have been made are built on.

We must also ensure that we make real progress in reducing reoffending. We have made some progress, but not enough. Our target is to reduce reoffending by 10 per cent., but at the current rate of progress, there is a real risk that we will not achieve that. There is a sense among my colleagues that if it ain't broke, don't fix it. I would not say that our probation services are "broke", but I would say that the improvement made to date is not the most that we can achieve.

There is a real opportunity for us to make greater improvements if we manage to separate offender management from interventions and identify more clearly the outcomes that we want so that we can make another change rather like the one that we made in 2001.

The driver for change should not be the way in which we have always done things around here; it should be the ambition to do things much better.

Martin Horwood: The Minister says that this is not about sticking to the way in which we have always done things. We have, however, been doing things this way only since 2001. Is she not worried that one of the contributors to the success that she claims could be the presence in the current structure of local probation boards, which, as her proposals make clear, will cease to exist in their current form?

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Gentleman has no evidence that local probation boards are the most important, or even a substantial, contributor, although they have certainly played a very important role. Let us be clear; local probation boards make a contribution partly because of their coterminosity with the police, a function that my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) mentioned, which has been very useful.

Another reason why we have been able to improve some of these services is that the local criminal justice boards have worked in partnership with probation officers, with the police, with the judiciary and others to improve offender management.

As the hon. Member for Cheltenham knows, we are also considering the future structure of the police force. As my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow rightly said, that is one of the challenges that we face. People have urged me to listen, and I agree that we must get that structure right.

There is no doubt of the benefits derived from police forces and probation services being able to work in partnership. One has only to consider community sentences and prolific offenders. There is already collaboration between police officers in basic command units and people who work in probation, and that collaboration extends to some voluntary sector partners. I know, for instance, of voluntary sector initiatives in my constituency that work with offenders and are making a contribution. We also need to get that sort of very local partnership right, and we are open to suggestions about how to do that.

John McDonnell: Very briefly, is the Minister assuring us that any changes to the probation service will be timed to be made exactly when changes to the police borders are made?

Fiona Mactaggart: My hon. Friend knows that I cannot give that precise assurance, but I hope I have convinced him that I strongly believe that we want to move these things forward in a parallel way so that we can reap some of the real benefits of coterminosity and working in partnership, which have not been emphasised sufficiently in the debate.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The patience taught at Cheltenham ladies college is commendable and essential for this debate. My hon. Friend does not seem to have grasped our point. We all want the improvement that has taken place with the creation of a national service to continue, but we are arguing about the best way of advancing that. The improvement has been achieved on the basis of the local running of the service, of co-operation and of a community service serving the courts. The Minister asserts that the service can be improved further by bringing in commercial briefs and contestability. Can she prove that?

Fiona Mactaggart: Until some of it has happened it is difficult to prove precisely how any initiative will operate. At present some 20 probation hostels and other similar provisions are provided, not by the probation service but by voluntary sector providers. Those play a critical role in public protection. In addition, there is provision in the prison service. Hon. Members have referred to that and pointed out how the privately run prisons are largely modern prisons. That is true. Nevertheless the advantages that they have introduced in the way we run our prisons, in terms not just of the physical space of prisons but of the relationship between prison staff and inmates, have significantly improved the decency agenda in our prisons.

That is not something that everyone predicted would happen as a result of introducing the private sector in prisons, but it has been an important result which has had an impact on the culture of the public as well as the private prison service. It has helped to make our prisons more effective. We believe that the best way for the public interest to be served is to identify what needs to be done, the functions that we expect the probation service to fulfil and the standards we expect. We then must look at the best way that that can be achieved. That might be to invite voluntary, private and charitable organisations to play a role. They already do to some extent. Their role has been kept quite small and frankly needs to be much bigger.

It might be achieved through the private sector which has introduced the more efficient use of technology in supervising offenders. That is not universally efficient and not every change has always been excellent in all respects. That is true of any major public sector reform. There is no doubt that some of the savings that we have been able to make by introducing, for example, tagging on bail have enabled us to run a safer service to protect the public at less public expense.

Why do I want to save that public money? It is not to reduce the spending on this facility but because I believe that we need to reinvest it in further initiatives to improve public protection. The best way to improve public protection is to reduce reoffending further. We have made progress on that, but it has been at a snail's pace. It is quite clear that community sentences—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. The next issue that requires our attention is the funding of children's hospices.

Children's Hospices

11 am

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): I am delighted to have secured the debate, because the hospice movement does a fantastic job of backing up the health service by providing vital palliative care and relieving the pressures on families and carers. Children's hospices are a crucial, albeit relatively new element of that care; as the Minister will know, the first children's hospice was opened only 22 years ago, in 1983, and there are now 38 throughout the country. Children's hospices play a vital role in providing respite care and palliative care for vulnerable and ill young children. None the less, there is a problem.

I pay tribute to the thousands of people throughout the country who devote their time and energies to raising money to run children's hospices. As the Minister and my hon. Friends will know, running a children's hospice is not a cheap business; the level, quality and cost of providing such care are immense, and people are fundraising day in, day out, through efforts small and large, to ensure that the good work that hospices do can continue.

In that respect, I pay tribute also to The Sun and its online campaign "Help sick kids". The Sun has linked up with Somerfield in helping to raise funding for children's hospices to the level of that for adult hospices. It is heartening to see that many people in public life have signed up to the campaign, including Sharon Osbourne, Dame Kelly Holmes, Gary Lineker and Barbara Windsor. That is a plus, because it will not only raise the profile of the children's hospice movement, but be a stimulus to raising money. At least 8,000 people have so far pledged their support for what is a relatively new campaign.

What, however, is the problem? Over the past 22 years, children's hospices have evolved significantly, and, as I said, we now have 38 of them. They provide a range of care and support services to meet families' needs. Equally importantly, they provide those services when families need them. In 2004, the Government published their 10-year national service framework for children, young people and maternity services to support the implementation of the every child matters programme. The key principles of that guidance are that care must follow the child; families need choice over where their children are cared for; and respite care is a crucial ingredient, which should be seen as part of general provision, rather than as a separate service, so that we have a holistic approach and an integrated service that meets the needs of carers and their families.

Children's hospices have a crucial role to play in advancing those aims, but the problem that faces them, even more than adult hospices, is funding. Whereas adult hospices receive just under 40 per cent. of their day-to-day funding from central Government, children's hospices, rather amazingly, receive just under 5 per cent. on average. As everyone will appreciate, that gap is significant. Equally importantly, it shows the mountain that voluntary fundraisers have to climb in raising the funding that children's hospices need to make ends meet and continue providing care.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on having secured the debate.

I know from Cransley hospice in my constituency, which looks after adults, how difficult it is to raise enough money to provide all the care that is required, despite the fact that, as an adult hospice, it receives 40 per cent. of its funding. It must be nearly impossible for children's hospices, which get as little as 5 per cent., to meet the targets that they have set themselves.

Mr. Burns: I know that my hon. Friend has a close interest in the well-being of his local hospice, and does tremendous work in supporting it. He makes a valid point, and reflects the experiences of many hon. Members and their constituents. The situation is critical, and that is one of the reasons why I was so keen to seek this debate. I wanted to bring home to the Minister, if he is not already aware of them, the sheer pressures and problems facing children's hospices in particular—but it is not unique to them—in raising the money to make ends meet.

In my region, East Anglia—if we take that to include the northern part of Essex—there are three children's hospices: in Ipswich, Milton near Cambridge, and Quidenham in Norfolk. In south Essex, including my constituency, we are fortunate in having a fantastic children's hospice, Little Haven. It is close to the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink), but it serves the area up to mid-Essex, including Chelmsford. Their problem is that they receive significantly less funding from state sources than the adult hospices, so they have tremendous difficulty in raising sufficient money to meet the inexorable increase in costs that they must meet if they are to survive.

I suspect that nobody in this Room would disagree that for those children who, sadly, have advanced progressive illnesses our objective must be to provide the highest possible quality health care services, tailored to individual needs. That is what the providers want to be able to offer, and what ill children and their families deserve to receive. However, hospices are, unfortunately, chronically underfunded by the state. The NHS has relied heavily on the good will and charitable funding of the hospice movement. That inequality needs to be addressed, and the taxpayers' contribution to hospice services increased—in the case of children's hospices, greatly increased.

While, thankfully, the number of children and young people diagnosed with life-limiting illnesses is relatively small, those who have terminal conditions are surviving for much longer than was the case in the past. However, the current provision of palliative care services in no way reflects that; it has not been able to adapt sufficiently to meet the challenge, as we all hoped that it would. Children's hospice provision is particularly underfunded compared with that for adults. That is why I plead with the Minister to listen carefully to the messages of this debate, and to seek to ensure that something is done to rectify what is seen by many as an incomprehensible situation.

In 2000, the Government made available through the big lottery fund some funds for children's palliative care. Why should lottery funds be used to fund children's hospices and palliative care? Surely, funding should come from central Government, at least to the same degree that it does for adult palliative care. Back in 1988, I proposed a ten-minute rule Bill that would have set up a national lottery, the proceeds of which would have gone to funding health care. That would have been additional money, not a means of allowing the Government to cut their contribution by the amount that the lottery raised. It is ironic that, root and branch, Labour Members and Labour shadow Ministers strongly opposed that concept at the time, saying that it was entirely wrong that a lottery should provide funding for the health service, because funding was the duty of the state through the tax system. They said that if that happened, Governments would be tempted to use the money that was raised from a lottery for the health service and to cut the amount that the Treasury would make available to it.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): My hon. Friend makes a good point. It was very prescient of him to propose that legislation some years ago. Does he not agree that what has happened with funding of hospices breaches two of the major tenets of the lottery when it was set up in 1994? First, it breaches the tenet of additionality—that the lottery should not be a substitute for mainstream funding from the public purse, and secondly, it breaches the tenet that it should be at arm's length because, as my hon. Friend said, the Government closely influence the causes funded by the new lottery.

Mr. Burns: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. He is absolutely right. He has identified a sad contradiction between the rhetoric and the actions of the Government. Frequently the rhetoric sounds fine but, sadly, when it comes to implementation of that rhetoric through action, it can be a very different thing. My hon. Friend gives a powerful example of one case in which what the Government say is not what they do, which is to be deplored.

The money from the big lottery fund runs out in April 2006, and there are currently no plans to make any more cash available through that sourcing. Perhaps, as with the three-year announcement of public spending, that does not mean that the Government will not continue to provide funding from that source after April 2006. However, to the best of my knowledge, no categorical assurance has been given. Given that the Minister has been sitting in the debate shaking his head in a negative way, I hope that he will be able to reassure us that the Government will continue to provide that source of funding to the hospice movement. I am sure that he will do so because it would be good news and it is systematic of this Government that they are more than happy to announce and sometimes re-announce good news.

If there is to be a good-news announcement during the debate, which I will warmly welcome, will the Minister temper that good news with an explanation of why he thinks it is justified for the Government to rely on funding from a lottery source for that sort of financial aid to a crucial area of health care, rather than using that lottery funding as additional to the amount that the Government have given? It seems to most people that the Government are using the lottery to reduce the contribution: that they are making up the shortfall through the lottery rather than maintaining high levels of Government funding and then topping that up from the lottery as a bonus.

I hope that my own local children's hospice, which is also the hospice that serves the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), who is equally involved and active on their behalf, will benefit from such continued funding. Whatever money the Little Havens children's hospice may have received in the past does not take away from the fact that it currently receives only 2 per cent. of its £1.6 million costs per annum from Government funding sources. The Minister will see from that that 98 per cent. of that £1.6 million must be raised from other sources to ensure that the hospice can continue to do the fantastic work that it does.

In that respect, I make another plea to the Minister regarding a problem that applies both to children's and adult hospices. They have to negotiate with their primary care trusts for funding. In principle, we support the philosophy behind PCTs—that 75 per cent. of health funding is given to a local organisation, staffed and manned by local people, which can identify local health needs and distribute the money to provide health care in the area.

The trouble is that many hospices, especially children's hospices, because there are fewer of them, have to deal with several PCTs, usually individually, to secure funding through that stream. That is time-wasting, cumbersome, bureaucratic and difficult. Without compromising the independent nature of PCTs, I urge the Minister to ascertain whether there is anything that he can do, through the Department of Health, to get PCTs in respect of adult and children's services to unite and provide one forum for negotiations for hospice funding, rather than hospices having to go through the burdensome procedure every year of approaching each PCT to secure funding.

It would also be of great benefit to children's hospices if the Government could announce a three-year rather than a year-by-year, programme of funding, as they have done in other areas of public spending such as general health and education. A three-year programme gives greater security and the ability to plan for the future. Like practitioners in the health and education services, I welcome that excellent system because of its clarity and transparency and because it gives those services greater ability to plan over a longer period. Under the old system, the services found out only a few months before the beginning of a financial year how much money they would get, which caused uncertainty and disruption until the money was announced.

I would like more to be done about the provision of palliative care in children's hospices and for the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence further to develop standards in health and social care. I support the continued roll-out of the gold standards framework in palliative care, but the NHS desperately needs adequate and appropriate resources to deliver such standards. I estimate that the cost of delivering palliative care services is likely to be identified by NICE as requiring an additional £40 million funding a year for hospices and approximately £60 million for other palliative care services.

I want to see a more cohesive and community-based approach to palliative care and new initiatives to be engendered that provide care in a range of new and innovative settings. Partnerships should be encouraged between local NHS bodies, health and social care providers and the voluntary sector to harness the expertise of professionals to provide care-based quality standards. By allowing money to follow the patient, the patient should have the right to choose the place in which they, their families and their carers would most like to be placed.

Hospices have a vital role to play in palliative care—partly, but not exclusively, in relieving pressure on the NHS through the fantastic work that they do. Many patients at the end of their life require the specialised and continuous services that hospices can offer. Hospices must have the resources that they need to respond positively to the demands made on them and to provide the greatest care possible for some of the most vulnerable, sick and frail members of society, whether they are children or adults. That is why funding from the state to children's and adults' hospices must increase.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I know that the Minister is listening carefully to my hon. Friend and that he will do his best to help. Unfortunately, I am chairing a meeting at the same time as my hon. Friend's debate, so I am a bit stretched. He mentioned Little Havens, and I wonder whether he is aware that I was at a charity event on Saturday and that the lady who spoke to try to raise more funds said that if it were not for charitable giving continuing, by spring there would be no money left to continue the service. The situation is serious. Would my hon. Friend agree that the Minister should do everything that he can to underpin the funding so that there is some certainty in future arrangements?

Mr. Burns: I am grateful to my hon. Friend because he has hit the nail on the head with the hammer. There is a terrible strain on hospices year in and year out, particularly on children's hospices because of the disparity in state funding. The army of people who help to raise money for Little Havens cannot be praised enough for their fantastic work. However, the state has to help that army because 2 per cent. of funding from state sources for the hospice is, I think the Minister would agree, wrong and unfair.

As my hon. Friend knows, we fought a general election six months ago and the Conservative party was clear about what it believed should happen to the funding of children and adult hospices. We do not believe, and neither does the hospice movement, that the state should step in and pay more than a maximum of 49.9 per cent. of the funding. If the state were to pay more than that, it would start dictating terms because it would have the whip hand as the funding source. One of the strengths of the hospice movement is that it is charitable, relies on the voluntary sector and organises its own provision of care within strict guidelines for quality and standard.

The hospice movement does not want to be taken over by the state, and we do not want it to be taken over. However, we believe that that cannot be used as an excuse not to give a fair and reasonable amount of money to allow it to thrive. Every pound that the hospice movement raises to pay for the care of its client group is a pound less that the state has to pay. If only for that reason, the Government should be shamed into making more money available.

My hon. Friends and I fought the last election on the policy, as we did in 2001, that if we were returned to office we would increase funding for adult and children's hospices so that they got 40 per cent. of their funding for their day-to-day running costs from the state. That is a fair balance and would make a significant difference to the strains and pressures facing the hospice movement. That would give breathing space and extra money so that hospices would be able to run their services and provide care with less of a burden and worry about where the money was coming from. If that argument is valid, as I think it is, it is even more valid for children's hospices.

For a children's hospice to receive less than 5 per cent. of its funding from the state in this day and age is a travesty and a national disgrace. We are talking about young children and teenagers who, through no fault of their own, find themselves with life-limiting or serious illnesses and disabilities that place a tremendous strain on their families and carers. In some cases, without a hospice to step in and help, there would be no one else. Those families would be left on their own to fend for themselves with all the problems and pressures that causes. For the state to be content to provide less than 5 per cent., less than 5p in every pound spent on those vital and valuable services, is a national disgrace.

I urge the Minister to give serious consideration to the matter, because it has come up time and again in the House, and it will not go away by ignoring it or by flowery flannel, where Government spokesmen try to give the impression that the situation is infinitely better than it is. It is not good, and if the Minister does not believe that, and more importantly, if the Treasury does not believe that, let them go out into the country and visit children's hospices. Let them talk to that army of decent people who spend so much time working to raise money for hospices and find out from them exactly what is going on, the problems and difficulties that they are facing, and the possibilities of cuts in the services, of which we need more, not less.

11.26 am

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on securing the debate. I listened to him carefully and agreed with most of what he said. However, in some ways, I part company with him, because he talked about the Government's record and I do not remember his Government delivering any better when they ran the country. I do not want him to lecture this Government on what they should be doing.

Mr. Burns: The hon. Gentleman made an allegation about the previous Government's record. It is slightly facile to compare something with the situation that prevailed over eight years ago, but given that he is obviously an authority on the subject, can he tell the House what was the percentage of funding for adult hospices when the Conservative Government left office, and what is it now? If he cannot say, I will.

Dr. Kumar: The purpose of the debate is to secure support for hospices. I remember the record of the hon. Gentleman's Government: year in, year out, there were cuts in budgets.

Mr. Burns: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman is not familiar with the health service. If the Minister is honest, he will admit that there was never a 1p cut in total funding for the national health service from the day that Margaret Thatcher became Prime Minister in 1979 to the day that we left office in May 1997. In fact, there was a more than real-terms increase. As for hospice funding, when we left office, the state provided 33.5 per cent. of the day-to-day running of hospices to the hospice movement. At the moment, it is just under 32 per cent.

Dr. Kumar: I am sure that the Minister will respond to the facts and figures, but my experience on Teesside is quite the opposite of what the hon. Gentleman is saying. This is an important debate, and I wish that he had not politicised it in the way that he has: it is tragic because the issue is important. If you want to battle on with figures, I am sure that the Minister will pull out the figures.

Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I do not want to battle on anything. Will he please address his remarks through the Chair to the hon. Member who is making the claims?

Dr. Kumar: Thank you, Mr. Cook, for correcting me on the manner in which I should have addressed the hon. Gentleman.

I want to open up the debate in good faith, in trying to support much of what the hon. Member for West Chelmsford said. He mentioned the 38 children's hospices. One of them is in the north-east, and I am sure, Mr. Cook, that you are familiar with it, because it is on your patch, on the Stockton side, rather than the Tees valley on my side. I am sure that if you had not been chairing the debate you would have said something similar to what I am about to say.

I support much of what the hon. Gentleman said about concerns for hospices. I want the Minister to listen carefully to what I have to say; I am sure that he will. I speak as a friend and supporter of the Government in all that they have done in tackling problems of health and in all the support that they have given to the health service. I speak as a strong friend, not as a foe, as the hon. Gentleman has done. I shall focus on one issue, but first I want to praise the work of Butterwick house children's hospice in my area, because it provides and has provided a tremendous service for children in my area and in the north-east as a whole. I want to pick up on the issue of funding, which was addressed by the hon. Gentleman, because it is a concern for people in the north-east, including many of my constituents.

As I said, Butterwick house children's hospice provides a tremendous service, from which about 80 families in the north-east, many of whom are my constituents, benefit. It provides many useful services, such as complementary therapies, advice and pre- and post-death bereavement support and counselling. The hon. Gentleman referred to such services. The hospice provides a breathing space when things go wrong and support for families over 24 hours. It has had a tremendous impact on the quality of life of families and children in my area.

Butterwick house hospice and other hospices save the national health service a great deal of money. The resources and the bed space that a hospice provides facilitate tremendous support and ensure that people receive an excellent service, which should have been available in hospital. The mere fact that people are in a hospice saves the health service some money.

Butterwick house hospice enjoys tremendous support from my constituents and others throughout the Tees valley, but it feels that it is threatened by lack of funds. I have received a document from its chief executive, Mr. Graham Leggatt-Chidgey—no doubt he is familiar to you, Mr. Cook—about the funding concerns. He informs me that the hospice is in real difficulty because of funding problems. He tells me that the £145,000 annual grant that the hospice receives from the big lottery fund expires on 31 March 2006, and he is naturally very worried. The hospice is working exceptionally hard to secure funding from a range of sources, but the harsh reality is that it can only operate a service that can be financed. The hospice is worried and has asked me to raise the issue today, which is why I am here.

The £145,000 from the big lottery fund contributes 21 per cent. of the hospice's annual funding. Unless that funding is replaced, there is a real threat that Butterwick house's front-line services will have to be cut, which will have severe consequences for many families in my constituency and in the north-east as a whole. It will also have adverse effects on the NHS in the region, which will be forced to replace some of the specialist services provided by the hospice.

As the hon. Member for West Chelmsford said, many hospices have to deal with a large number of primary care trusts. Butterwick house has to negotiate with 15 PCTs for its funding, which presents huge complications and difficulties. I know that the Minister will tell me that the PCT reconfiguration will simplify some of these matters, but children's hospices face serious difficulty with rising PCT deficits and staff already in transitional mode, which has resulted in their not being willing to make any financial commitment for their successors. That is genuinely a serious worry, too.

I speak with great concern. I have never before raised the issue of hospices on the Floor of the House, but I raise it now because I am concerned. I know that the Minister really cares about these issues, so I am sure that he is taking serious account of what is being said. Local health authorities and social services have significant financial difficulties and restraints, and although they are willing to help children's hospices in most cases, they often find that their resources are scarce.

As the hon. Member for West Chelmsford said, children's hospices receive only 5 per cent. of funding from the Government. The consequence of that for Butterwick house was that in order to balance its books, it had to raise about £600,000 last year. All of us have been involved in various forms of fundraising, so we know that that is a lot of money for an organisation to raise, despite the fact that people in this country give generously. Given that adult hospices typically receive 35 per cent. of funding from the NHS, children with life-limiting and life-threatening illnesses seem to be getting a raw deal. I agreed with much of what the hon. Gentleman said, but I found the way in which he was saying it—against this Government—difficult to stomach. We must move away from the 5 per cent. figure: we must increase it. That cannot go on. It does not look very good. As someone who champions the Government and recognises the great contribution that they have made to tackling health problems, I speak as a strong friend to them. I urge the Minister to take note of this point: we must balance the level of funding to adult and children's hospices. I am not seeking more: parity would be enough. We are talking about a lot of money, but it can be seen as a challenge or target. We have to ensure that the funding that adult hospices receive will lead to further Government funding from here onwards. That is a goal that we should work towards.

We must ensure that hospices get support. People who work in them give their best because they believe in them and in the caring service. Butterwick house has made a tremendous contribution to our area. It will be a huge loss if the services there are cut, and there will be great concern in Teesside. I assure the Minister that as we approach the end of the financial year, Members from the Tees valley area will speak on this issue. No doubt you might speak on the issue, Mr. Cook, if there is a further need for debate. I want to make the Minister aware of this issue long before we get down that road, because it is of genuine concern.

The people at Butterwick hospice are not alarmist. I have never know them to express worry about dangers like this before. In all the years that I have been a Member—I have lived in Teesside for 21 years and know the area well—this is the first time that they have written to me in this spirit. Therefore, I ask the Minister to listen. We need some action to be taken. The hon. Member for West Chelmsford and I might have started on a wrong note, but his points were genuine. As someone who champions Butterwick hospice care, I passionately believe in the support that it gives our area in the north-east. I do not want the Minister suddenly to make an announcement; I know that he has to go away and think and put figures together, but I appeal to him. If he really wants to help, he should please consider the situation. If he is in a position to meet the people from Butterwick hospice, I am happy to bring them to the House with a delegation of right hon. and hon. Members from my area. I hope that you, Mr. Cook, can assist with this matter in future. We do not want the hospice to be threatened with service cuts toward the end of the financial year. I do not want the Minister to say, "Nobody made me aware of this," at that point. I seek his support on this and on the wider principle of increasing funding from 5 per cent. The Opposition suggested a figure of 49 per cent.

Mr. Burns: It was 40 per cent.

Dr. Kumar: Well, I would be happy with 30 per cent. If we had equal parity with adult provision, I would be happy. I am not asking for the figure to be announced tomorrow. I want to see some movement from the Minister. Given the Government's excellent record it would be a credit to them and the Labour party if he shifted from the position that he holds today.

11.40 am

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): Perhaps I might act as a peacemaker between my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) and the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar). I will attempt to pour oil on troubled waters. Before I do so, I apologise again to the House that I am not able to be present throughout the debate. There are conflicting interests and someone is chairing the meeting that I am supposed to be chairing at the moment. I mean the Minister no discourtesy.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford on securing this extremely important debate. It is timely because Dame Cecily Saunders died this year. She was the remarkable lady who said that people go to hospices not to die, but to live. Certainly in the years that I have been a Member of Parliament, I have been moved by those women and men who work in a voluntary capacity in our hospices throughout the country. All hon. Members support their local hospices. All hon. Members have friends and relatives who, sadly, are served by them. This is not a party political matter. I am not interested in what the last Government or the Government before that did. I am only interested in what good news, as we move towards Christmas, the Minister can announce this morning.

No one has done more than my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford to fight for resources for hospices in Essex. He is served locally by a splendid hospice but he will recall that when I represented Basildon, one of the two miracles that occurred in my area was that we built St Luke's hospice, which is a first-class hospice today, without any core funding. No millionaires lived locally, and if there had been any I would have been on their doorstep for obvious reasons.

As one of the original supporters of the national lottery, I felt that it should never be used, as it is today, for funding for education and health. I recognise that the Minister has no responsibility whatsoever for the way that lottery money is spent, but I believe it is a tragedy that more and more lottery money is spent on health and education. As we have the Olympics in 2012, there will be even less money from the lottery than at present. I hope that in his reply, the Minister will look specifically at the amount of money that the Government can give to the hospice movement.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford and I served together on the Health Committee. The Minister, if he has a spare moment, can look back on the report on palliative care that we produced two or three years ago under the chairmanship of Mr. David Hinchliffe. We took evidence from a wide range of witnesses, who all shared with the Committee their increasing concern about the way that funding seemed to be slipping from core funding to charitable giving.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford and I salute those who do voluntary work in Essex. We are both blessed to live in a county where people give so readily to charity. However, the fundraisers at Little Havens tell us very firmly that because of competing interests, there is less and less of an audience to which they can turn, and they are struggling to raise money from charitable giving. That is why I was delighted to be in Leigh-on-Sea's Salvation Army Christmas concert on Saturday, which raised a huge amount of money—as we know, the Salvation Army leads the way in such matters. The lady who addressed us said that it is becoming increasingly difficult, in terms of charitable money raising, to keep our hospices going. She was very concerned that unless the Government hike up the money—my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford quoted the percentages earlier—there will be a crisis.

I am sure that, when he responds to the debate, the Minister will agree that we all want to be healthy. There is nothing as stressful as having a child who is ill. Ironically, it affects the child's loved ones rather more than it does the child, because children are very tough and resilient, but the parents and other relatives can go to pieces, for the very good reasons of stress and anxiety and the understanding that there are no miracle cures. Little Havens is a first-class hospice that looks after such children. It also provides respite care for their loved ones. Again, I say to my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford—because some of the children from his area are looked after at Little Havens—that Little Havens wants to do more, but it cannot because of its tight budget.

In conclusion, I say to the Minister that all hon. Members recognise that the Treasury has its priorities. We all know that Health Ministers will do their best to fight for as big a share of the cake as they can get. However, we should never take for granted the work of our hospices, their army of volunteers and the number of charitable organisations that support their overall budget. The hospice movement wants to retain its strong sense of independence but, increasingly, it finds itself struggling. How can we say to parents, "This is going to be very difficult because we are running out of money and there is a limit to what we can do"? I do not suggest that we go in for blackmail, but there can be no greater priority than looking after children who are unwell at a time when emotions are running high. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford on having enabled the House to consider these matters, and I very much look forward to hearing good news from the Minister about the future amounts of money that will be dedicated to hospices, not only in Essex but in the rest of the country as well.

Stephen Williams (Bristol, West) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on having secured a debate on such an important and emotive topic, and recognise the passion and commitment with which he addressed his subject.

It has been said a few times that, nationally, there are 38 children's hospices. The nearest one to my constituency is Little Bridge House in north Devon. On a good day on the M5 and other roads, that is about two hours away, but frequently it takes rather longer to get there. There is certainly demand in greater Bristol for a new children's hospice. In the heart of my constituency, we have the Bristol Royal hospital for children. Bristol, West also has CLIC, the well-known charity for children with cancer and leukaemia, which was founded in Bristol. The Association of Children's Hospices is also based in Bristol. There are plans to build and equip a new children's hospice at Charlton Farm in Wraxall—just over the Avon gorge, which divides my constituency from Woodspring. However, it will cost £15 million to build and equip the new hospice and to endow the initial running costs. Some £5 million per annum will also need to be raised to run it jointly with the hospice that I mentioned in north Devon.

I was pleased recently to attend a fundraising ball; it will contribute in a small way towards the costs of running the hospice, but as has been mentioned, such charitable fundraising is competing with ever-growing demands from other parts of the health care system and from other charities that are trying to raise funds. The children's hospital in Bristol is having a Wallace and Gromit appeal to raise funds, while the hospice is having its Babe's Big appeal. We therefore have well-known children's characters competing to raise funds for essentially the same sort of care for children. I am also aware of the campaign being run by The Sun, although I was not aware, until the hon. Member for West Chelmsford mentioned it, of the campaign run by Somerfield. I am pleased to hear about it, however, because Somerfield is also a Bristol-based commercial company.

As has been mentioned, children's hospices receive about 5 per cent. of their funding on average from the state, but 15 of the 38 existing hospices get no state funding whatever. That compares with core funding of 28 to 30 per cent. for adult hospices. Surely, it is reasonable that hospices that give children essential palliative care, which might otherwise be provided by the NHS, should get a fair price for those services from the NHS or other health care commissioners. It is not immediately clear, however, how they can access some of those funds.

In 2002, in response to a parliamentary question tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), the then Minister, now the Minister for Housing and Planning, the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper), said:

> "It is for the national health service locally to make arrangements for financial support for both adults' and children's hospices, given the extent of local diversity both of the services provided and of alternative sources of local support."—[Official Report, 11 March 2002; Vol. 381, c. 818W.]

The restructuring of primary care trusts has been alluded to, and I wonder whether existing PCTs or even new ones have adequate funds to provide that support, particularly given the situation that I mentioned in the south-west, where children will typically come from a wide range of communities. A better way of directing funds towards hospices might therefore be to fund them on a regional level.

In the recent general election, the Labour party manifesto contained a commitment to increasing end-of-life palliative care, and I look forward to the Minister expanding on what that means, particularly for hospices. I share the concern expressed by other hon. Members that it would be unrealistic to expect the state to fund hospice care entirely, and we are certainly not arguing for that: it would undermine hospices' charity ethos, their volunteer base and their independence from the state. Surely, however, it is realistic to expect the state to pick up more than 0 per cent. of funding in 15 cases and more than 5 per cent. in 23 cases, and to at least match the average funding that is given to adult hospices. That would give children's hospices some degree of core funding and security so that they can provide an important and appreciated service in our communities. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

11.54 am

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I too congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns). It is a shame that more hon. Members have not been able to participate in the debate, but that does not reflect on the seriousness of its subject, which affects all hon. Members; in many cases, it will have done so directly and personally, because relatives and friends will have used the facilities that children's hospices provide. They do an essential job.

I declare an interest as a patron of the St. Barnabas hospice in Worthing, which is the parent organisation of a recently set up children's hospice, the Chestnut Tree house, which is a fantastic facility on the outskirts of Worthing. Staff at that hospice have already looked after many of my constituents. St. Barnabas has been running for 32 years, and in that time has provided direct care to 20,000 people. That is no mean achievement.

It is estimated that, generally, hospices must provide about 80 per cent. of all palliative care in the United Kingdom. Part of the problem is that the provision of hospices is subject to something of a postcode lottery. There is patchiness in the provision of children's hospices. As with many charitable causes, they are quite often less easy to find in less affluent areas. That results in a double whammy whereby many facilities are not available in areas where they are desperately needed.

Hon. Members have already mentioned the legacy of Dame Cicely Saunders who died this year, having set up the first hospice in 1967 and the first children's hospice in Oxford in 1982. The Chestnut Tree house hospice was opened for overnight care in April 2004, and has already cared for 135 children and young adults with life-limiting conditions. It has also provided services for almost 500 family members. I wish to pay tribute to Monica Ridley, who recently stood down as chairman of the trustees of the Chestnut Tree house hospice, and to Hugh Lowson, who, as chief executive of St. Barnabas, has made a great impact on that excellent resource over the past few years.

All hon. Members agree that we owe a great debt of gratitude to the volunteers who make the hospice movement possible. They are unsung heroes who do much to take the pressures and strains off the national health service, which would otherwise have to pick up the tab. All hon. Members have, in affectionate terms, mentioned hospices in, or close to, their constituencies. We heard about Little Havens in Essex, Butterwick in the constituency of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar), St. Luke's hospice in Southend, and Little Bridge House in Devon, which the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Stephen Williams) mentioned. The latter hospice is two hours away from the hon. Gentleman's constituency, which reinforces my point about the patchiness of provision. There are other high-profile children's hospices that do a fantastic job, such as the Shooting Stars hospice in south-west London and the CHASE hospice in Surrey, which has been at the forefront of a campaign to secure a fairer deal on funding.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford made some good points, especially on how important it is that hospices are able to keep their independence. There is a strength and wealth of talent and good will in the hospice movement. The last thing that hospices would want is to be nationalised in some way. As the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland put it, we must achieve something approaching parity of funding with adult hospices. He made some good points about the range of care that Butterwick hospice is able to offer. It is not just a matter of the last few days of someone's life; especially for children, it is a matter of their going there for short stays to take the pressure off parents and to take advantage of specialised facilities and complementary therapies. The hon. Gentleman freely admitted that that hospice is facing a funding crisis. I defy any hon. Member who has been in touch with a local hospice to come away with a different story.

Nationally, about 20,000 children are suffering from life-limiting diseases. An average of around 4,300 of those children and their families are assisted by hospices, but there are only a few hundred acute beds available in children's hospices. Those figures apply to the 38 fully operational children's hospices and another five that are planned or being built.

It is interesting to reflect on the nature of the diseases that children's hospices treat. Some 96 per cent. of cases that are treated in adult hospices tend to be of some form of cancer. Mercifully, only one in 600 children under the age of 15 develops a cancer, and children respond differently to treatment than adults do. Some diseases that children's hospices deal with are: Duchenne muscular dystrophy, which affects 100 boys born each year; Batten disease, or neuronal ceroid lipofuscinosis—that will really frustrate Hansard—which affects one in 30,000 births and leads to a progressive and incurable deterioration of the brain and nervous system; Rett syndrome, which affects more than one in 10,000 females and causes profound and multiple disabilities; and cystic fibrosis, with which hon. Members will be more familiar.

Children with those diseases now live well into their teens, so many fall into the gap that exists between adult and child provision. Therefore children with the aforementioned diseases form an increasing body. As a result of advances in medical technology, more children can live much longer with diseases from which they would have been expected to have only a short lifespan. Surely children's hospices' work load will increase as the pool of children with whom they will deal increases. Unfortunately, those diseases will still be around until we find a cure, but they are much more manageable, and children can, fortunately, often live on into adult life.

First and foremost, children's hospices deal with health problems. In a country that has a national health service that is charged to deal with such problems, surely hospices should be an integrated beneficiary of national health funding. Even at the most advanced stages of a disease, caring for the dying is a fundamental part of health care and should not be treated as some novelty good cause that may be lucky enough to pick up public funds through a lottery board's philanthropy.

I fear that the care of children with life-limiting conditions often does not fit into the Government's obsession with a health service that is driven by target tables, waiting-list numbers, hospital admission numbers and bed blocking. How does one measure the outcomes of looking after children who have life-limiting conditions? Obviously, one does not measure those outcomes on the basis of how long they stay in hospital, by minimising the cost of their drug treatment, or by curing their diseases and cutting down on their readmissions. One does not measure those outcomes based on comparative morbidity rates or on the number of complaints made about treatment. They can be measured only by the length of time for which quality of life can be extended, the impact of physical pain relief on the child and his or her emotional well-being, and, of course, the impact on the family and how they cope at a tremendously emotional and traumatic time before and after their child has passed away. That is what children's hospices are all about.

One cannot easily evaluate, quantify, tick boxes for or comply with target tables for children's hospices. They are measured by the comfort and relief that they bring. As someone put it: "Hospices are not places where people go to die; a hospice is somewhere where you can come to life." That is the modern vision of palliative care.

On the subject of funding, many hon. Members have already mentioned that children's hospices receive, on average, little more than 5 per cent. of their funds from public sources. The former Minister for Public Health, Melanie Johnson, raised the problem. She stated:

"Funding the services provided by hospices is a matter for negotiation between the hospice concerned and the NHS primary care trusts to which the hospice provides a service. There are no limits to the amount of funding which may be provided; this is for local decision."—[Official Report, House of Commons, 16 September 2004; Vol. 424, c. 1759W.]

The problem is that there are no limits to the minimum amount that primary care trusts can provide. In many cases, because it is not a statutory requirement and because of the great funding pressures on PCTs, they provide zero funding for children's hospices. Unless there is a statutory duty on PCTs to provide funding, I am afraid that, because of priorities and because PCTs are strapped for cash, children's hospices will not get a look-in, whatever we might say here. The Minister and his Government must take direct action to encourage PCTs to provide funding.

The new opportunities fund—now the big lottery fund—provided £48 million over three years for 130 palliative care projects. The funding runs out at the end of March 2006. At present, there are no plans to renew that funding. I shall be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about his intentions, now that March 2006 is just four months away. Children's hospices have received little, if any, of the extra money from the cancer plan funding that the Government established some years ago. The Government promised to double the level of investment in palliative care, but, often, that extra investment has got lost in PCTs and has not found its way to end use in hospices—most certainly not children's hospices.

In addition, in the past few years there have been many extra funding pressures on charitable institutions such as children's hospices from national insurance increases, extra pay pressure from Agenda for Change, price inflation of 7 to 9 per cent. for pharmaceutical products that are heavily used in hospices, extra requirements under the Care Standards Act 2000, and the estimated £400 million of VAT that is not reclaimable. I hope that the Minister will be able to give assurances of a more sympathetic financial treatment of children's hospices from the Treasury in future.

I remember speaking on this subject in the House three years ago. It is not a new subject or a new problem, but it is getting worse. I was told that new funds such as Futurebuilders would help to deal with the problem. Futurebuilders is a fund designed for voluntary bodies. I tabled a parliamentary question recently to ask how much money Futurebuilders had paid out, and how much of that had gone to children's hospices. Out of a promised fund of £120 million, so far about £4.5 million has been paid to voluntary bodies, of which not one penny piece has gone to any hospice, let alone any children's hospice.

Perhaps we should not be surprised about that, because to qualify for funding from Futurebuilders the applicant must be able to show that 50 per cent. of core funding is sustainable. However, children's hospices rely on very transient funding. We cannot say that a given number of people will die in the coming year and leave legacies to a hospice in their wills. Charitable fundraising is, as we know, unpredictable. It is virtually impossible for those hospices to get funding from Futurebuilders.

We owe an enormous debt of gratitude to the carers of the children who use children's hospices. There are about 6 million carers in this country, more than 2 million of whom are aged over 60, and 20 per cent. of whom are over 70. They do an enormous amount, for which they get little gratitude, and without them the state would have to pick up the tab and things would be much more difficult. We should be making their job easier, not harder.

I want to end my remarks by relating the problem to the Chestnut Tree house. My local children's hospice is one of those 15 that receive zero funds from the public purse. It has been losing staff because of wage pressures. Charitable fundraising has raised some £600,000 in the past year, but it takes almost double that to run the hospice. Therefore, the parent hospice, St. Barnabas, must subsidise its work. That is unsustainable. Donations have been difficult recently because of all the competing charitable pressures, not least the tsunami. We all know the enormous amount of fundraising that was done for that.

The Chestnut Tree house has four acute beds at present, plus one for emergencies, but it was planned that it would have eight, plus two for emergencies. It has received no money from Children in Need, despite repeated applications to that charity. We are told that West Sussex has had quite enough, so it is tough. It used its grant from the New Opportunities Fund to develop a very sophisticated and welcome bereavement counselling support service for parents of children who have gone into a hospice.

All in all, hospice funding is highly unsatisfactory and it is time that things changed. It is particularly unsatisfactory that many hospices must shrink their services at a time of growing demand. Effectively, many hospices are subsidising the NHS by providing services that it would otherwise have to provide. That contravenes Charity Commission rules. Is that really the way in which to fund health care? Would it be acceptable for the Government to seek to fulfil their target to recruit so many thousands of doctors or to reduce waiting times for hip operations to less than 18 months through random grants from one of the lottery funds? Of course it would not, so why should palliative care for children be treated as a bonus good cause that just happened to come up trumps this year under the Government's current definition of what worthy cause needs to benefit from the British public's gambling largesse? What happens when that funding stream runs out next year? Faced with those pressures, how can hospices plan long-term expansion strategies?

Health policy is not rocket science. It must treat palliative care and hospices as a mainstream health activity, and it must feature in the health strategy of all the NHS providers as a matter of course. We need fair funding through the NHS, not funding at the whim of the lottery, which sends out the message that the Government do not regard hospices as a priority. Surely we should be doing everything that we can to help to nurture, to encourage and to expand the tremendous legacy of Dame Cicely Saunders.

The Government really should be doing more to support the fantastic work done by children's hospices, and I hope that we will hear some wise and solid words from the Minister and the assurance that the Government will at last take children's hospices seriously as a mainstream provider of palliative care in the NHS.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I am pleased to serve under your chairmanship again, Mr. Chope.

I congratulate the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on securing the debate, and my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough (Jeff Ennis), who has done an extraordinary amount in the past few years to challenge the issue in the House. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Flello), who is not in the Chamber this morning but who very much wanted to be. He secured an Adjournment debate on the subject on 3 November, and I am happy to spell out many of the things that I said that evening, because they correspond directly to the points that hon. Members made this morning. I welcome the support of The Sun and of the Daily Mail, which has dedicated its Christmas appeal to children' hospices.

In the past three months, I have had the opportunity in the course of my ministerial duties to meet some of the most extraordinary people and public servants at work in this country. In Stoke, I met the people behind the Donna Louise trust and some of the families who had benefited so much from the services with which the hospice provides the local community.

As I went around the hospice and met some of the children who use its services, as well as some of the families of those children, one parent really helped me to understand the difference that some of these hospices make to families when she said that sometimes the pressure of looking after a child with a life-limiting illness was so great that all sorts of things crept into family life. She told me that it sometimes felt as if the whole fabric of goodness in the family was unravelling. That helped me to understand that, as well as supporting hospices, there is an enormous amount that we need to do to support carers.

The steps that we have taken to increase support for carers, which is up to £185 million this year, is a vital part of the debate, too. I saw some of the fantastic games rooms that the trust has been able to provide for teenagers. I met one of the children, Tilly, who uses the service there and told me about the fantastic Jacuzzi that makes her visits to the hospice very special.

The trust is only one of five or six different places in which I have seen the most extraordinary services for children in the past two or three months. In Liverpool, I heard from Lynda Brook, a paediatric palliative care consultant, who is behind the reorganisation and development of services for children at Alder Hey hospital. She is also instrumental in developing the Alder Hey at-home service, which is a new service that Alder Hey is pioneering.

At Christie hospital NHS trust, I met Sam Smith and Pauline Sutherland, the paediatric oncology liaison nurse, who shared with me the ways in which they are reshaping services for teenagers. They made the point that the manner of the care must take account of the nature of the individual, because we will be able to provide care sensitively, compassionately and appropriately only if we take account of the way in which people live their lives.

At Great Ormond street hospital I met the team that is working with children that have cystic fibrosis, and I learned about the extraordinary advances that the NHS has been made in treating such children. I also met Dr. Carlos de Sousa, a pioneering consultant who is developing an extraordinary new treatment for people with conditions such as uncontrollable epilepsy.

I walked around the ward with Dr. de Sousa, where we met one of the families whose children are benefiting from an extraordinary new technique. It is called invasive monitoring of the brain, and it allows surgeons to see which bits of the brain are involved in what sorts of activities, and to work out which bits of the brain need treating if uncontrollable epilepsy is to be dealt with effectively. I stood in the room with the family, we looked at one another, and we all agreed that the NHS is indeed at the cutting edge of medical science. It is the medical equivalent of rocket science.

We are fortunate to have world-leading medical researchers, consultants and surgeons. In our local communities, we have extraordinary public servants working in NHS community nursing teams; and we have the hospice movement, which has grown to a record strength over the past few years. I join the hon. Member for West Chelmsford in recording my admiration and thanks for the parents and families that are involved in that movement.

Our challenge is to weave those experts—all those who provide care and support—into a web of care around children and their families. The debate about caring for children with life-limiting illnesses is not only about children's hospices, it is also about providing an entire web of care.

As the hon. Member for West Chelmsford said, the children's hospice movement has grown up over the past 22 years. Since 1997, there have been seven key steps.

Mr. Burns: I was interested in the Minister's recollection of his visits to hospitals over the past few months. How many children's hospices has he visited in that time, and which ones?

Mr. Byrne: I said at the beginning that I started my travels of the past few months at the Donna Louise trust. That is the principal hospice that I have visited on site, but I have met multi-disciplinary teams working with hospices throughout the country.

On 3 November, in a debate that the hon. Gentleman was not able to attend, I said what steps have been taken since 1997, but I shall repeat them for his benefit. The first was our immediate commendation of the report by the Association for Children with Life-Threatening or Terminal Conditions. That was closely followed by the second step; NHS executive guidance was issued in 1998 that drew on lessons learned from a series of projects that provide a range of care to families.

The third step also occurred in 1998, when a team headed by the Treasury invited applications to establish Diana children's community nursing teams throughout the country. They were to build on the work undertaken in the first pilot programme and blaze a trail for the development of home care for children with life-threatening illnesses. Additional funding of about £1.5 million to support that project in England was provided by the Treasury.

The fourth step was the partnership that became possible in 1998 when the Association of Children's Hospices was registered as a charity to promote the interest of the children's hospice movement. Since then, the Department of Health has worked closely with the association to develop a better understanding of the issues on both sides. In particular, the Department has commissioned the association to provide quality assurance packages to enhance the quality of care provided by children's hospices.

Step five, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned, took place in 2000, when, after discussions with the New Opportunities Fund, about £45 million was made available to 135 projects, including 71 awards to home-based palliative care teams. Step six took place in 2003, when the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence commissioned the national collaborating centre for cancer to develop service guidance on child and adolescent cance. services, including palliative care and bereavement support. NICE service guidance supports the implementation of the national cancer plan and also forms an additional structure to provide support for children's palliative care needs. The seventh step involved work with ACH, where the Department funded the production of care pathway guidance launched last year to complement the national service framework on disabled children and young people.

That is the past, so I will now talk about the future. As hon. Members from all parties have argued for some time, the steps taken are not enough and we must and can go further. Several trends emerge from the work on hospices undertaken by ACH. Often hospices are set up after a family's tragic struggle, and they create an enormous amount of energy to see through an important dream backed through the strength of local communities. As a former native of Harlow I well know the generosity and support that is available in Essex. To help ensure that that energy is channelled in the right way, the Department of Health can do a great deal to support innovative services.

Part of the answer has to be how we support hospices in their plan. To support those ambitions the Department provided funding for ACH to develop a toolkit on how children's hospices work, which aims to provide references to the sources of information that are required to plan and establish services so that any new services that are being set up can make informed decisions about what services the families would find most helpful. As the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) pointed out, children with life-threatening illnesses often have different conditions and needs. The services that hospices need to provide are often varied. However, the toolkit provides a much better understanding of what is involved in starting and running a hospice and an overview of some of the challenges.

Although there is support for the hospice movement, the Government have to bear their share of the responsibility. We must take three steps. First—this is probably the crucial point—we must strengthen the support provided by the local NHS for hospices. We have tripled the amount of money that will go into the health service by 2007–08 to £92 billion. At the heart of this morning's debate is how we make that money work for local people who provide hospices for children. The way in which the local national health services will work together is important.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East and Mexborough has said on a number of occasions, many hospices provide services over wide areas. I know that the hospice near his community confronts that challenge. We need to ensure that local health service commissioners work together effectively to provide financing. I have launched dedicated guidance for that purpose that will build on and make real the intentions expressed in the NSF for children and young people, which is mandatory for the NHS. I have laid copies of the guide in the Library, and it will support health care organisations, local authorities and other partners. Of course, a range of partners are involved who are working together in children's trusts to understand and develop children's palliative care services and make the mandatory NSF a reality. The guide is important because it sets out the service model, describes the elements that need to be involved and gives practical examples of the services that need to be provided and how they should look.

Secondly, we must make specialist commissioning sharper. My noble Friend, Lord Warner, made a ministerial statement on Wednesday 19 October announcing a review of NHS specialist services. The taskforce set up to lead the review will be headed by Scotland's chief medical officer and will consider how such services are commissioned and how they can be changed in future. It will address to a good extent the issues raised by the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Stephen Williams), when he said that a stronger way of doing things is needed than the method that we now operate.

[Mr. Byrne]

Finally, I want to consider the question of resources. I made an announcement to the House in the Adjournment debate on 3 November, which was secured by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South. He spoke passionately about the need to extend the manifesto pledge that we made about strengthening end-of-life care for adults. He asked why we could not extend that commitment to include children. I can tell him, with the agreement of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Health, that we shall extend that pledge for children and young people with life-threatening conditions. I shall make further announcements to the House as soon as possible, but I expect that the Department will be able to say far more about how the policy will be implemented in detail, in the forthcoming White Paper on social care and health.

Tim Loughton: We have only a few minutes left, and we have heard an awful lot about what the Government do and must do. Now we hear about a White Paper. However, on 31 March the £45 million from lottery funding that has benefited a number of children's hospices will run out. Will the Minister tell us now what resources will be available to children's hospices to make up for that shortfall after 31 March, or whether he is prepared in some way to compel PCTs to make sure that they pass on to children's hospices a fair share of the funding that I think he intends should go to them, but which, in 15 cases at least, does not—not even to the tune of a penny piece?

Mr. Byrne: I can help the hon. Gentleman with that. My understanding, from the advice that I have received, is that the New Opportunities Fund money expires in 2007, not 2006. I shall happily write to the hon. Gentleman to correct those details if I am mistaken. The detail about how we proceed with our commitment will be in the White Paper, which will be published at the turn of the year. We have held several meetings with the national cancer director and officials. We are also in discussion with people who run children's hospices. Much of the planning work is some way through, but the precise details must wait for the White Paper.

Mr. Burns: I hope that the Minister is not trying to talk himself out. He has spoken for 16 minutes and has three minutes left. The nub of the debate, for every hon. Member who spoke, was whether the Government would give a fairer share of money to children's hospices, compared with the amount for adult hospices. The Minister has not dealt with that and is leaving it to the tail end of his speech.

Mr. Byrne: I regret the manner in which the hon. Gentleman thinks the debate should be conducted. I think that I have made it clear that we must do three things to strengthen funding for children's hospices. We must ensure that specialised commissioning is fit for the purpose and that PCTs provide adequate funding and know how to go about that; we shall also extend funding for children's hospices by extending the manifesto pledge that we put to the British people in May. The way in which we shall implement that will be set out in the White Paper that will be published at the turn of the year.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for his earlier kind remarks about my campaigning zeal. I shall try to give some comfort to the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) by asking whether the onus now is on PCTs to engage actively with local children's hospices in trying to set up work agreements and contracts. Previously the children's hospices have always had to engage the PCTs in the process. Are we shifting the onus for who must engage with whom?

Mr. Byrne: The way in which PCTs should operate is set out clearly in the guide that I have placed in the Library. The job is considerably easier for the extra £16 billion that is going into PCTs. We are not quite clear whether that commitment is matched by the Conservative party, but I am clear about the fact that it is helping local health service commissioners.

To strengthen end-of-life care for children with a life-limiting illness we must do a number of things. This is not just a debate about children's hospices. It is also a debate about how we strengthen NHS community care for children and how we strengthen tertiary care and the range of other services that are provided by NHS consultants and surgeons. We strongly believe that treatment for children with a life-threatening illness will be best when the NHS works together with the hospice movement, and that is exactly what we plan to see happen.

Slavery (Abolition Anniversary)

12.30 pm

Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): I am very pleased to have secured this debate on the 2007 anniversary of the abolition of the slave trade in the United Kingdom. Unfortunately, the topic still has much resonance today.

I have the enormous good fortune to represent one of the three Hull constituencies. Hull's proud history as a trading and maritime city and a port goes back more than 700 years, and the city has played an important role in the life of the nation. In 2007, it will be 200 years since Hull's Member of Parliament and most famous son, William Wilberforce, oversaw the abolition of the slave trade, against which he had campaigned for many years.

I want to do three things. First, I shall talk a little about William Wilberforce the local Hull man and about his campaign to rid the country of the slave trade. Secondly, I shall talk about the city of Hull and its long-standing role in championing human rights. Thirdly, I shall discuss the extensive celebrations that Hull is planning for the bicentenary in 2007, which are known as Wilberforce 2007.

In 1759, William Wilberforce was born into a family of wealthy merchants in the High street. His father died when he was quite young, so Wilberforce spent time with his aunt who was under the influence of John Wesley and the Methodist movement. It is worth pointing out that Christianity played an enormous part in his life and the causes that he took up.

It is also worth pausing to note that Wilberforce's house in the old city is now the award-winning Wilberforce House museum, the first in Britain to tackle the subject of slavery and its abolition, and one soon to celebrate 100 years in operation. It is currently undergoing major redevelopment and refurbishment in preparation for the 2007 celebrations.

At 17, Wilberforce went to St. Johns College, Cambridge, and he was shocked by his fellow students' hard drinking—some things never change. He then went on to represent the city of Hull as its Member of Parliament, having been elected in 1780, at the tender age of 21. It was a hard-fought contest and his election cost the exorbitant sum of £9,000. Clearly, that would breach many of the conditions that the Electoral Commission puts on elections these days. Wilberforce entered Parliament and supported the Tories—they were the future then. His friend William Pitt, was the youngest Prime Minister this country has seen.

In 1784, Wilberforce converted to evangelical Christianity and joined a Christian group known as the Clapham set. At that juncture, he decided to follow the social reform agenda in Parliament and was approached to campaign particularly against the slave trade. Between 1776 and 1807, it is estimated that Britain trafficked about 1 million people, so it was a huge issue that Wilberforce was going to have to tackle.

The Society of Friends had been campaigning against the slave trade for many years and had presented petitions in 1783 and 1787. Wilberforce first introduced his Bill against the slave trade in 1791, when it was easily defeated by 163 votes to 88. Of course, Wilberforce had the support of many parliamentarians and people with a social conscience outside Parliament, and I should mention Thomas Clarkson and Granville Sharp.

The abolition of the slave trade finally became law in 1807 thanks to Wilberforce's tireless campaigning. He died on 29 July 1833 and was buried in Westminster Abbey. One month later, Parliament passed the Slavery Abolition Act 1833, which gave all slaves in the British Empire their freedom.

In addition to his campaign against slavery, Wilberforce was involved in other social reform organisations and in setting up of the charity that is now known as the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

The anti-slavery movement was arguably the first international human rights movement, and Wilberforce was its prime mover in the British Parliament. Hull is very proud that its MP led such an important movement, and I now want to move on to how the city has built on that heritage.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Lady on having secured this important debate. Before she moves on to other aspects of Hull, may I draw her attention to the Reverend William Knibb, a son of Kettering, who was a leading light in the Baptist missionary society? I associate myself with her remarks about Christianity and the promotion of religion, which drove people such as William Wilberforce to abolish slavery.

Ms Johnson: I am grateful for that intervention. It reinforces the role that religion played in a lot of social reform movements in this country.

Because Hull is a port city, many people pass through it, and it has had to have an eye to the injustices that have happened in continental Europe and further afield because some of those passing through have claimed asylum and refugee status. With its strong maritime and trading background, Hull was relatively unusual at the time of Wilberforce in that it did not develop its wealth from the slave trade, unlike cities such as Bristol and Liverpool.

Stephen Williams (Bristol, West) (LD): As a Bristol Member, I am in a position to intervene on the hon. Lady. She has referred to her city's positive past, with Wilberforce as its champion in getting rid of the slave trade. Bristol, as the principal slaving port during much of the period to which she refers, unfortunately has a rather more negative image, but wishes to mount an important exhibition to mark the 200th anniversary of the abolition of the slave trade. We were therefore shocked and disappointed to discover last week that the application by the British Empire and Commonwealth museum had been turned down at the first stage by the Heritage Lottery Fund. Would she be willing to join me in urging the Minister, as well as her city colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister, who has supported Bristol on previous visits to the city, to ask the Heritage Lottery Fund to consider—

Mr Christopher Chope (in the Chair): Order. That intervention is too long in a short Adjournment debate.

Ms Johnson: Thank you, Mr. Chope. I reinforce the point that Hull comes to the 2007 celebrations with clean hands. It had a pioneering MP who fought very hard to bring about the abolition of the slave trade, and I believe that it is appropriate for Hull to lead the national celebrations in 2007 because that would bring clean hands to the whole debate.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I praise my hon. Friend for this great debate. Would she stretch her point to say that the achievements of Wilberforce spilled over to America, which followed some 30 years later in abolishing the slave trade?

Ms Johnson: That is absolutely right.

I want to combine my historical approach with a tribute to the work done by the city of Hull in recent years in the field of human rights. In 1982, Hull became the first city in the west to twin with a third world city—Freetown in Sierra Leone, the world's first colony for free Africans, which was set up in 1792 by Wilberforce and Thornton. In the 1980s, the then leader of Hull city council, Alderman Patrick Doyle, was instrumental in developing the links to enable it to twin with a developing country. Those links have gone from strength to strength over the years. We now have eight schools actively twinned with schools in Freetown as well as further links with churches and hospitals. A head teacher in Hull recently said to me that he would like to extend the opportunities for teachers to have work placements in Sierra Leone in 2007, and he hoped that some funding might be available to facilitate that.

Hon. Members will also know that Freetown is still recovering from a lengthy period of considerable turmoil. There is much scope for development in Sierra Leone, and I hope that in 2007 the Government will take a view about the extra support that it might wish to offer to Freetown, and to other cities in this country that wish to form links with developing world cities.

Hull was also the first local authority to sign up to Amnesty International, and Desmond Tutu and Nelson Mandela are freemen of the city. For many years, we have celebrated the spirit of William Wilberforce through the Wilberforce lectures. This year, James Coleridge Taylor, head of the national commission for democracy and human rights in Sierra Leone, will be our key speaker. We are also a proud fair trade city in Hull, having obtained that status earlier this year.

I must also mention the important development of WISE—the Wilberforce Institute for the Study of Slavery and Emancipation—which was established at the University of Hull. Its patron Desmond Tutu said of it:

> "It is exemplary that the university should build on the history of the city and one of its most outstanding citizens. Tragically, slavery and the violation of human rights are still with us in the 21st century. The institute will be a beacon that will continue to throw a light on issues that are too often overlooked."

The institute brings together the study of history, law, politics, anthropology, medicine and genetics, and had its funding launch at Downing street, hosted by Cherie Booth.

Unfortunately, we know that slavery continues around the world today. A conservative estimate is that 27 million people are still in bonded slavery. That is why it is still a critical issue that we need to address in the 21st century. WISE will be able to build on the work that the University of Hull has undertaken in years gone by on the history of slavery, as well as on the association of the world's first professor of social justice at that university.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson) on securing a debate on a really important issue. While we are talking about Wilberforce and the past, we must not forget that we still have a form of slavery in this country: there are sex slaves imported from eastern Europe. Does the hon. Lady agree that we need a campaign as vigorous as Wilberforce's to get rid of that evil?

Ms Johnson: I agree absolutely with what the hon. Gentleman says. I am proud to have rehearsed the list of Hull's commitments to human rights over the years. Hull is often portrayed as geographically isolated and a rather backward-looking city. However, it has a forward and progressive approach to today's world.

In conclusion, I want to talk about the plans for celebrations in 2007. There will be 34 weeks of celebration in Hull, starting in March and ending in October 2007, during black history month. I shall read through some of the plans already in place. There will be a fair trade fortnight in March to start the celebrations. Hull Truck Theatre, which is nationally renowned, will put on a play on the subject of the modern issues of equality and freedom, which is to be written by Caryl Phillips, and which will go on tour to Liverpool and Bristol. We shall see the re-opening of the Wilberforce house in March 2007. The Hull Philharmonic orchestra has a special one-off commemorative concert to coincide with its 125th anniversary. There will be an international conference on the themes of "Slavery: Unfinished Business", which the University of Hull is organising. There will be a football tournament in our wonderful KC stadium, at which all teams will be playing for the Wilberforce cup. There will be a film festival celebrating films on the theme of freedom. We hope that there will be a Sierra Leone cricket tour, which will bring a team from Sierra Leone to tour Hull and to play the Wilberforce XI and local teams. We shall also have the Wilberforce lecture, and in 2007 we have already secured the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Prime Minister of Barbados as our key speakers. There will be a memorial event in the Wilberforce gardens, which are attached to Wilberforce house, and we hope that there will be a national competition for a piece of art to celebrate Wilberforce's life.

I am sure that the Minister will recognise that Hull is a long way down the path of ensuring that the celebrations are a success. Given Hull's unique and relevant links to Wilberforce, the council's support for human right over the years, and the city's long standing links with Africa, it is absolutely appropriate that the city should seek to lead, promote and commemorate the bicentennial of the abolition of the slave trade in the United Kingdom for the whole nation. I extend an invitation to the Minister to visit Hull, to see how well we are doing with our plans. I hope that he will be able to attend some of the event in 2007.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. David Lammy): I am very grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson) for introducing the debate, and giving me the opportunity to respond on what I know all hon. Members here will know is an historic occasion for me, as the descendant of freed slaves. The 200th anniversary of Parliament's passing of the Slave Trade Act offers us an incredibly important opportunity to mark a crucial turning point in this country's history.

I want to set out how important I believe 2007 and the bicentenary of the abolition to be. In so doing, I pay tribute to the work of those who have done so much to keep alive the spirit of the abolitionists and who are now planning on making the bicentenary such a success, particularly in my hon. Friend's constituency. I also want to indicate where the Government believe they can best contribute in the lead-up to 2007.

From 1562, when the first English slaving expedition was led by Sir John Hawkins, to the eventual freedom of enslaved men, women and children in the British Empire on 1 August 1838, this country was intimately concerned in slavery and the slave trade. Until the 19th century, slavery was considered by many to be an acceptable part of the economic system and the fabric of this country. It was seen as enabling many countries in Europe and beyond to profit from the exchange of goods produced by a vast pool of free labour.

At the time, the legitimacy of slavery was justified by people from across society: politicians, businessmen, scientists and even some within the churches. Indeed at some time or another much of the country was intimately connected with slavery and its products. Every spoonful of sugar or coffee and every bale of cotton was closely connected with the slave trade. This country was not alone in benefiting financially from the slave trade. Yet, as the strongest power of the age, it bears a great weight of responsibility. As the bicentenary of Parliament's passing of the Slave Trade Act approaches, it is right that we begin to feel that weight more keenly. There are very strongly held views on the historical facts of slavery, the moral and legal accountability of those who were involved and the lasting effects. Many people have argued that the repercussions of the slave trade still resonate down the centuries.

The bicentenary in 2007 marks a crucial turning point in this country's move towards the nation it is today. It was a critical, if long overdue, step into the modern world, which we should still be proud this country took before any other. We took it before France, the United States and Brazil. I am very keen that we use the bicentenary in 2007 to the best possible effect. So, 2007 offers a timely opportunity for the people of Britain to recognise the reality of the transatlantic slave trade, to mark the abolition itself and the role of ordinary people, alongside other Britons, Africans and Caribbean people to help bring slavery to an end.

My hon. Friend has eloquently reminded us of one of the great heroes of the abolition movement—William Wilberforce. His conviction, his strength and above all his belief and sense of purpose, still shine out to us over the intervening years. Many people will already know a little of his life, and those of his contemporaries such as Thomas Clarkson. As my hon. Friend said, 2007 offers a great opportunity for his life and achievements, and those of his contemporaries to be made much more widely known.

I am also keen that in 2007 we do our utmost to celebrate the lives and contributions of those abolitionists who are not so well known. I think of Olaudah Equiano, thought to have been born in 1745 in west Africa, and kidnapped and sold into slavery in the west Indies. Having bought his freedom he became a leading spokesman for the campaign for the abolition of the slave trade and slavery. His autobiography is still in print today.

In addition to Equiano, there is Quobna Cugoano, the acclaimed writer who was born in 1757, who denounced the evils of slavery and pleaded for human dignity, not the relocation of ex-slaves to Sierra Leone. There is also Ignatio Sancho, who was born on a slave ship in the mid-Atlantic in 1729 and who became a leading activist in the pro-abolition campaign.

All three were Africans and important figures in this country's history. One of the measures of a successful year in 2007 will be that the lives and achievements of those still largely unknown Britons are brought to the fore. I am pleased that plans for a major ground-breaking exhibition in 2007 on the life and times of Equiano are already well advanced.

The year 2007 also offers the important opportunity to celebrate the lives and achievements not only of politicians, church leaders, Africans and former slaves, but of the countless ordinary British citizens who demanded change. Their petitions, marches, lobbying and prayers were crucial in putting pressure on Parliament to abolish the slave trade. They were ordinary people who spoke out against what they knew was wrong, despite the unpopularity of their views at the time.

Therefore, in addition to ensuring that the reality of the transatlantic slave trade is highlighted in 2007 and that we celebrate the achievements of the abolitionists, I want to ensure that we make the links between the concerns for justice that were present 200 years ago and our current concerns to tackle modern-day slavery and injustices, such as dealing with people trafficking and smuggling, making progress on providing debt relief for the poorest countries in the world and on development and justice in Africa, and dealing with the trade in sex slaves that the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) mentioned. It is right that we understand and do all we can to combat those injustices.

I believe that the bicentenary in 2007 offers a chance for the country to make a collective commitment to ensure that in another 200 years, no one should feel the need to express the same level of regret for our actions today. That is a bold ambition, but 2007 is the right year in which to make it.

We know that poverty and social exclusion are at the root of most forms of contemporary slavery. Since 1997, the UK has doubled its aid budget and the primary focus of our programme has been the elimination of poverty. Where possible we do that by supporting country-owned development plans. At the G8 summit in

[Mr. David Lammy]

July, it was agreed that an extra $50 billion a year would be provided to poor countries by 2010, some $25 billion of which will go to Africa, which will more than double our aid to Africa compared with 2004's figure.

A key aim is to ensure that the needs of the poor, and particularly the most vulnerable groups, are taken into account in all the Government's approaches. It is therefore right that I should highlight just a few of the approaches that are already being adopted by the Department for International Development to tackle modern-day forms of slavery.

In west Africa, we provide more than £1 million to the International Labour Organisation's programme to tackle descent-based slavery and other forced labour issues. In Sudan, we support the participation of displaced children, including those who have been forced to work as soldiers and slaves, in the rebuilding of Sudan. The Government's contribution is nearly £500,000. In Nepal, the modern slave trade project provides more than £250,000 to reduce the number of young boys and girls coerced into prostitution.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to the considerable work already undertaken in Hull at the Wilberforce House museum and the Wilberforce Institute for the study of slavery and emancipation. The close working between the museum, the University of Hull, the city council and others is a strong example of how we are most successful when we work together.

Through its close connections with William Wilberforce and as one of the country's major ports, Hull clearly has a key role to play in 2007. I am especially pleased that it has been working closely with the other great port cities of Liverpool and Bristol, which had a direct connection to the slave trade. The focus in Hull on highlighting the historical detail of the slave trade, the role of abolitionists and the links to modern-day forms of slavery and injustice is the focus that will make 2007 a success. Hull will rightly play a major role in the events of 2007, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for inviting me to visit the city. I look forward to seeing the work she outlined in the new year.

I recognise the pivotal role of Hull—I underline pivotal—and I shall highlight a few of the other initiatives that are already in hand or planned for 2007. The National Maritime museum in Liverpool will open a new gallery, known as the national museum and centre for the understanding of transatlantic slavery. In the design of the displays and through focused outreach, the museum will target new visitors, particularly from under-represented and ethnic minority groups in and around Merseyside. Funding for the museum comes largely from the Heritage Lottery Fund. I am pleased that my Department is directly contributing £250,000 a year to meet the new museum's running costs.

Education and youth involvement is a key element in 2007. As part of strategic commissioning through the national-regional partnerships programme, my Department and the Department for Education and Skills have funded the understanding slavery initiative, involving Hull, Bristol, Liverpool and the National Maritime museum in Greenwich. I am pleased that since 2003 that initiative, which anchors teaching of the history of the period within the school curriculum, has received nearly £600,000 from the Government. It is most important that children in key stages 2 and 3 learn that history.

In funding events in 2007, the Heritage Lottery Fund is encouraging community-based organisations and others to apply for funding inspired by the bicentenary. It is keen to fund projects that add to the collective understanding of the transatlantic slave trade and its impact on our national heritage.

It was noted earlier that there was a problem in the application made in Liverpool; I was also lobbied vigorously on the issue by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Kerry McCarthy). I understand that the Heritage Lottery Fund will meet the Bristol Empire and Commonwealth museum again soon. The fund is keen to emphasise that it is committed to funding projects throughout the UK to mark the 2007 bicententary. It has already awarded grants totalling £15 million and published guidance for applicants considering projects. I hope that the problems, particularly those in Bristol, will be overcome.

We cannot hope now to right the wrongs perpetuated in the past, but we should not ignore them. We must learn from them, and take the opportunity of the bicentenary to engage more widely in positive debate about the evils of present-day unfree labour, trafficking and forced prostitution. We must also celebrate and commemorate the many lay people and parliamentarians, men, women and free slaves who successfully campaigned in Britain for the abolition of the slave trade.

Rural and Island Transport

1 pm

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): It is a great pleasure to have this opportunity to raise rural and island transport. I welcome the Minister and thank her for her great courtesy in meeting the leader of the Isle of Wight council, Andy Sutton; the councillor with responsibility for transport, Ian Ward; and myself—supported by officers—on Wednesday 1 December, when we discussed a couple of the issues with which we on the Isle of Wight are concerned. I do not intend to reiterate the arguments made then, but I know that the Minister was impressed by the passionate way in which Councillor Sutton made the case for a highways private finance initiative. We are ready and raring to go with a highways PFI. Our highways have been neglected for many years, so if the Minister wants the island to be a rural pathfinder for such a PFI, we are ready and waiting at the starting block.

I know that the Minister cannot make any commitments at this stage, and she said that she would not be able to visit us while the question of a highways PFI was up for decision, but she would be very welcome to visit as soon as she has made that decision, whether it is the right one or not. However, I am sure that she will make the right decision.

Under its new leadership, the Isle of Wight council is much more dynamic and forward looking than its predecessor. One area in which it is taking a proactive role is in easing and improving public transport. Charlotte Cooke, the member of the Youth Parliament for the Isle of Wight, as well as many of her predecessors and the Isle of Wight Youth Council, which was elected last Monday, have repeatedly complained about the cost of bus fares on the island, especially for young people. One of their biggest gripes is that, once one is 14, one must pay the full adult fare, which is not the case in many places on the mainland. Councillor Sutton tells me that he is looking very hard at introducing a £1 flat-rate bus fare for travel anywhere on the island. That will do wonders for young people in improving their choice of school, improving access to facilities in Newport, Ryde and the other towns and generally improving accessibility for the young, vulnerable and elderly. We are certainly pleased that that is going ahead.

The second issue that I raised with the Minister was cross-Solent transport. We have an excellent service; let us be in no doubt about that. There are around 300 sailings a day of various kinds and at various times across the Solent. However, they are costly for low-income groups. The hovercraft goes between Ryde and Southsea; the catamaran goes between Ryde pier and Portsmouth harbour; a car ferry runs between Fishbourne and Portsmouth harbour; the Red Jet runs between Cowes and Southampton; and another car ferry goes between east Cowes and Southampton. We also have the Lymington ferry. I will not go into all those services in detail.

I do not propose to ask the questions to which the Minister gave clear answers a fortnight ago, but I must reiterate the case for action to improve cross-Solent accessibility. The Minister's hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Health said 18 months or two years ago that she recognised that islanders should not have to cross the Solent to get to a dentist. I am pleased to say that there have been slight improvements in that area. Not all islanders now have to cross the Solent to get to a dentist. However, they must cross the Solent for other major medical interventions, including radiotherapy. A 30-day season ticket for the Red Funnel ferry—which is what one needs for a 28-day course of radiotherapy in Southampton—costs £180. That is a substantial cost, which is not met for everyone by the hospital travel cost scheme. That helps only the poorest. It does not help those visiting or accompanying patients. I met a resident in Newport earlier this year whose husband had died in a hospital in Portsmouth. She was very distressed because she could afford to visit him, she said, only twice a week before his death.

People also cross the Solent for education purposes: for higher education and for some aspects of further education that are not available on the island. I am anxious to ensure that a dialogue opens up between my local authority and the Minister's officials, so that the Minister will not in future be placed in the position in which she was placed this time. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced his Budget for elderly people to get free bus travel, that was costed without taking into account the cost of Isle of Wight ferries.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that perhaps one of the most crucial things for islanders, be they on the Isle of Wight or the Scottish islands of Na h-Eileanan an Iar or, indeed, Orkney and Shetland, is that a mile travelled at sea should be equivalent to a mile travelled on land, in that there should be some equivalence in the fares to overcome the disadvantage of island living?

Mr. Turner: I shall not go as far as the hon. Gentleman would perhaps like me to, but I thank him for his intervention. There are different costs to providing transport in different places on the mainland, so there could be no standard fare on the mainland, even if there were to be one on the island. I do accept, however, that people should not be significantly disadvantaged because they live on islands.

We do not have—I do not want to use the word "enjoy"—any subsidy for our ferries. That enables them to operate as quickly as they can and to respond to the needs of the market without an intermediary body. However, I would like the Minister's officials to work with officers of the Isle of Wight council to ensure that if another scheme comes up, we are not forgotten. I accept that, in the recent past, the council has not made approaches to the Department for Transport or its predecessors. As far as I know, it has not made any such approaches since 1997. I can therefore understand why the issue was not on the Department's radar, but I would like the Minister to accept that ferries are an integral part of an island's public transport network and to ensure that, in future, her officials are alert to our needs.

The Minister kindly agreed, when confronted with the costs of travel, to "reflect"—I use that word carefully. I am sure that, when reflecting, she will understand that a hospital car, which someone might use to get from home in, say, Alnwick to a hospital in Newcastle upon Tyne, is no use when travelling from Bembridge to Southampton.

[Mr. Turner]

There are a number of related cross-Solent issues. One is the failure of the Strategic Rail Authority and South West Trains to co-ordinate changes to timetables with ferry services and Island Line services. For example, the Portsmouth harbour train from Waterloo sometimes terminates short of Portsmouth harbour. If it finishes at Portsmouth and Southsea, people miss their ferry connection. Ferries will sometimes delay if a train is running late, but they cannot delay too long or they will miss the connection with Island Line at the other end. Island Line is, I think, the premier service in the country as regards meeting the Government's punctuality targets. The problem is that those targets are not as useful for people on the island if the train departs before the ferry arrives, as they might be in other places. There is a crossing loop on Island Line only two thirds of the way along the route, so an asymmetric service has to be provided. Will the Minister consider whether the punctuality targets can be appropriate for our trains in our places, rather than a standard national target?

Another change that the SRA and South West Trains made without consulting the ferry companies was in the services from Waterloo to Cowes. The through services that now leave at 5 minutes past and 35 minutes past the hour just manage to miss the bus that gets to the ferry in time to catch the Red Jet to the island, so the service between Cowes and Waterloo that used on occasion to be a two-hour service is now a two-and-a-half-hour service.

The bus and ferry companies could at least adjust that, should they so want, but the Lymington service, with which you may be familiar, Mr. Chope, has changed, too. The London to Brockenhurst to Lymington service has been adjusted, so it now no longer matches the times of the Wightlink sailings to Yarmouth. It is much more difficult for the ferry company to adjust its sailing times, because two ferries cannot pass each other in the Lymington river. Each of those examples is an occasion on which the SRA must consult other transport undertakings before it sets in stone new time.abling arrangements.

My final moan about South West Trains and the Strategic Rail Authority concerns advertisements for services, especially those from Waterloo. It would help if Cowes, Shanklin and other island destinations were advertised at Waterloo as they would be if they were railway stations on the mainland. The fact that there is a break in the service to take a ferry is no excuse not to advertise those destinations. If public transport is to be integrated, whether by Government or the private sector, it must be integrated fully. There must be effective advertising of all available services.

While I am on the subject of trains, I ask the Minister to look at the duration of the Island Line franchise and at Network Rail's long-term plans for the permanent way of the island's rail service.

I have two fears. First, the Minister may be aware that we have a unique vertically integrated railway franchise. That means that Stagecoach, which owns Island Line, is responsible for maintaining the permanent way—the crossings, embankments and bridges—and for purchasing, or hiring, and maintaining the rolling stock. If there is a short franchise, the money provided—notionally to support the permanent way—will be spent elsewhere in Stagecoach's extensive network.

Secondly, with a short franchise, there is not the same incentive that there might be with a longer franchise to invest in rolling stock. As a consequence, the Isle of Wight is still running London underground stock that dates back to the 1950s. It is quite effective, but it is not exactly attractive. We could do better for the island.

The Minister will be interested to hear about a ragbag of odds and ends that I want to draw to her attention. As well as ferry services, it is important that we develop air services to the island. They would not be used by an overwhelming proportion of the population, but they would encourage business and investment to the island. Air services would also encourage some higher-spending holidaymakers to visit the island.

We are pressing the South East of England Development Agency, through the Isle of Wight economic partnership, to examine the possibility of a helicopter link to Cowes, perhaps from Southampton airport. We are also pressing for the navigation system at Bembridge airport to be upgraded in order to make blind landing possible there. It is a wonderful airport with an excellent runway, but, at present, it is not possible to land a plane in the dark or when there is low cloud.

Just before the most recent council elections, the ruling group on the council proposed the introduction of a landing charge. Islanders viewed that as a covert form of congestion charge. Not surprisingly, they threw out the ruling group and elected the Conservatives instead.

I should like the Minister to give some assurance that if Portsmouth or Southampton city councils were to consider a congestion charge the cost would not be borne by Isle of Wight motorists. As I have said, the cost of crossing the Solent is already significant, and we do not want any artificial boost to that through a congestion charge.

Finally, as the Minister will know, two thirds of the island is made up of areas of outstanding natural beauty. Many areas that are not designated as AONBs are very attractive and worth visiting. I congratulate the Government on an excellent booklet on street design, reduction of road signs in rural areas and on enhancing the environment that English Heritage and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister have recently published. The environment of the Isle of Wight is precious to us all. I congratulate the Minister and her Government on that booklet and should welcome her if she would like to come to the island in the near future.

1.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): I congratulate the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) on securing this debate and on his energy in making representations to me a couple of weeks ago. He and his council colleagues have made many valuable points about transport on the Isle of Wight. We can all agree about the special character of the Isle of Wight and some of the particular challenges faced by rural and rural island communities in transport and in accessing services.

I hope that I will be able to respond to a number of his points. If I cannot cover them all, I shall be happy to speak to him later. He talked about bus transport today, as he did when we met earlier. The Government are heavily committed to supporting bus use. We are providing more than £360 million a year through the bus service operators grant and through rural subsidy grant, which is now £53 million a year and helps to support around 2,200 rural bus services. We also invest in particular projects, such as bus challenge schemes and kick start.

Isle of Wight services are benefiting from more than £250,000 in rural bus services grant in this financial year and have been awarded more than £1.6 million since 1998 to develop their rural bus services. That supports 15 services in the authority's area. The Isle of Wight was successful with a 2002 rural bus challenge bid, the "East Wight villager", for which it was awarded more than £400,000. The "East Wight villager" is essentially a demand responsive service, linking the small villages with the principal towns. The award paid for the purchase of the vehicles and provided support to maintain the service for three years.

The hon. Gentleman referred to concessionary travel. As he knows, the Government are committed to helping older and disabled people to access public transport. We introduced the first statutory minimum entitlement in 2001, which guaranteed half-fare travel on local buses. We will provide an extra £350 million in the next financial year to allow older and disabled people to travel free on local off-peak bus services. As he is aware, we have made it very clear that this is a baseline of service on which local authorities are encouraged to build. That may be in partnership with other local authorities, which is not so easy when one is separated by a body of water, or by developing additional services on top of the concessionary fare that is essentially Government funded.

It is pleasing to hear that the council is looking at innovative ways of approaching flat fares or other concessionary fare approaches to help meet the particular local needs of the community. The Government are investing the money to provide a service but we recognise that central Government cannot and should not attempt to develop a very responsive service to every local area's particular needs. We want local government to take a lead in doing that.

One of the appropriate ways for local authorities to rise to that challenge is in the field of community transport, which is particularly relevant to rural communities. Provision and funding of transport to hospital and medical facilities, for example, can be provided by a number of different organisations, such as the hospital trust, local, voluntary and community groups, and bus and taxi companies. Community services operated by the voluntary sector have a valuable role in supplementing public transport provision. Local authorities have the flexibility to support these services from their local budgets should they choose to do so. A local authority can use its allocation of rural bus subsidy grant to help fund such services, and many community transport operators are also eligible to claim bus service operators grant from the Department.

The hon. Gentleman has made several representations on making travel concessions on ferry crossings a statutory entitlement; that was the clear theme of his speech today and at our meeting on 30 November. As he vigorously explained, it will be necessary for islanders to travel to the mainland to access hospital health services or services such as education. However, I assure him that travel concession authorities can already provide enhancements to the statutory minimum requirement, and it would be within the local authority's power to give concessions on ferries, subject to financial priorities. The current basis of concessionary travel is the Government framework for a minimum entitlement, which leaves local discretion to add extras, such as bus travel before 9.30 am, community transport schemes and concessionary travel on services outside the local authority boundary.

The context is the financial settlement for local authorities, which was announced early last week. It was the first two-year settlement for local authorities' Government grant. Overall, £62 billion will be provided in 2006–07 and £65 billion in 2007–08. For the Isle of Wight, that means an extra £6 million, or 5.5 per cent., in funding in 2006–07. Taking formula grant and dedicated schools grant together, that will increase to £7 million, a 6.1 per cent. increase.

Mr. Turner: Can the Minister give a figure for reimbursing the cost of introducing the free fare scheme for pensioners?

Ms Buck: I am afraid that I do not have the figure with me, but the grant is not ring-fenced, as the hon. Gentleman is probably aware. The distribution is done under a formula and in consultation with local government. The money is then put into the general environmental and protective cultural services block of the revenue support grant for local authorities to draw on.

On roads, the hon. Gentleman made a strong case for supporting the roads private finance initiative. It may be helpful if I explain the bidding process for PFI. We aim to invite expressions of interest for further highway maintenance PFI pathfinder projects from local transport authorities early next year, although the exact details have yet to be finalised. Under the process for accepting bids, the Department will invite expressions of interest from local authorities and ask the strongest bidders to produce an outline business case. If the Department approves an authority's outline business case, it will be put forward to be approved by the project review group. The group is an interdepartmental body chaired by Her Majesty's Treasury and has to approve all PFI schemes that require central Government support.

On air services, the White Paper on the future of air transport supported the growth of regional airports and recognised in particular the role that air services can play in providing rapid access from the regions to other parts of the country. The network of domestic air services in the UK has expanded significantly in recent years, and several airlines specialise in serving thinner routes to small regional airports. We are looking to those carriers, working with airport operators, to introduce proposals for new commercial services and to open up parts of the country that do not possess air links. I am aware that there is a history of air links to the Isle of Wight, although no sustained air services have operated for a great many years. The potential for new services to the island would of course be restricted by the limited capabilities of the two licensed aerodromes, which could support only smaller types of commercial aircraft.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Island Line. As he knows, it is a stand-alone train operating company franchise operated by Stagecoach, and it is due to end in February 2007. The first stage of the procurement process for the letting of the new South Western passenger rail franchise has started. The new franchise will encompass the existing Island Line franchise. There has been no significant investment in the line for a considerable time, but it is being designated as a community rail line as part of the Department's community rail development strategy, which is examining the cost-effectiveness of infrastructure enhancements to enable a more regular service pattern to operate while reducing ongoing costs.

Progress has been made in establishing a community rail partnership for the island that involves the railway, the council, Wightlink and other user groups. Its main purpose will be to raise the profile of the line and to promote its local use and use by mainline visitors.

The hon. Gentleman made important and valuable points about information, advertising and rail punctuality. I promise him that I will ensure that the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Derek Twigg), who is responsible for rail services, is given a note of what he said, and I will ask whether he can add anything to my comments today.

We recognise that there are many challenges ahead, and that rural communities, particularly on islands, face very specific challenges. We believe, however, that there is a healthy future for rural transport of the island, given the Government's investment in local government settlements, in local transport plans and in the bus service, and given the partnership achieved by the Isle of Wight authority. I assure the hon. Gentleman that officials in my Department want to continue to work with the local authority to ensure that we make the best possible use of the opportunities available to us.

School Closures (Weaver Vale)

1.26 pm

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab): I am absolutely delighted to have secured the debate because the issue that I am about to discuss is causing great consternation in four villages in my constituency. Under an initiative that it has called "Transforming learning communities", Cheshire county council has introduced a document on which it will base its attempt to tackle what it describes as falling rolls and surplus school places. Several people in the villages of my constituency believe that, rather than transforming learning communities, the title of the document is a sort of euphemism and that the council will close at least two, or possibly three, schools in my constituency. That is why they are very concerned.

The council decided on the basis of population projections and birth rates that it will have a surplus of some 5,000 school places by 2010. It decided on a piecemeal approach to dealing with the problem and has divided the county into eight different areas, three of which it will visit this year, a few of which it will visit next year, and a few the year after.

The first tranche of the review deals with the area that it has called Frodsham and Helsby, which contains Manley village school, Kingsley St. Johns and Norley Church of England school, as well as a primary school. The review also covers Frodsham technology college, which it recommends for closure because it has only 700 pupils, at least 400 of whom are from outside the county council area. Most of them, in fact, come from the Runcorn part of my constituency, which also causes me some concern.

I do not believe that the county council has thought through the implications of closing Frodsham technology college for the other parts of Cheshire, particularly for the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller). Young people from the village of Elton in that constituency will be very much affected by the closure, and may be forced to go to a school other than Helsby high school for their secondary education.

The first tranche of the review suggests that Alvanley primary school merges—the council uses the word "amalgamate"—with Manley primary school, and that Kingsley St. Johns and Norley Church of England school should amalgamate. That could result in the closure of all four schools and the opening of two new schools on sites yet to be determined, or it could result in two of the schools closing and the two other schools amalgamating on one of the sites.

Whatever happens, village schools in my constituency will close. When we pressed the county council on the matter, its first argument was that it had to tackle falling school rolls and surplus places. The four primary schools, however, are full. They have a buoyant intake, they do not face the prospect of falling school rolls and they provide an excellent education for the pupils in their care. The role that they play in their communities is equally important. They are vital to the infrastructure of their communities, and closure of any one of them would be irrevocable.

The first thing that I asked the county council was that this was the first tranche of the review and it did not know what would happen in the other schools in the county, so why the piecemeal approach? It said that it would review the area again in 2008, so not only do we face a traumatic review in 2005, but three years down the track, when the county council has found out the implications of its reorganisation, it will revisit the schools that stay open. I have told the county council that it should adopt a two-stage approach. It should review every primary school in the county and, when it has an idea of the changes it would like, go to the second stage of the process and carry out the statutory consultations required by law. That would give us a clear picture of the effect on the whole county, and we would not have to tell schools that they would be reviewed again. Everyone would see that the process was fair and transparent.

There is a fear that the county council will do the first tranche of work and find out that the temperature out there is so hot that it needs to rethink its views, so that village schools in my constituency will close but a different attitude will be taken to reviewing the rest of the county. That would be unfair and unnecessary. I hope that the county council will consider that view, but I am not optimistic that it will do so when it makes its decisions tomorrow and on 19 December.

When pressed on the matter of falling rolls and surplus school places the county council has used 2002 statistics. The statistics for 2003 show that the birth rate in the county council area of Cheshire is growing. The county council advised me in a letter that it accepts that the birth rate is increasing, but does not know whether it is a trend. Without waiting to establish whether there is a trend of an increasing birth rate the county council went through an exercise of removing surplus school places across the county. It readily acknowledges that Alvanley primary school, Manley village school and Kingsley St. John's and Norley Church of England primary schools are, all four of them, full. They turn parents away each year because they are popular village schools.

The county council then deploys a different argument. When I first encountered it, I thought that it had carried out an assessment of the education in those four primary schools and come up with specific criticisms about what was happening. It said that the schools are small, with cross-age group classes, that they teach across the key stages, and that the head teachers all have a significant teaching commitment. Of course, that is true for those four schools, but it is not seen as a problem by Ofsted, which has inspected the schools and found them excellent.

On digging below the surface, one finds that the criticism does not arise from observation of the four primary schools in my constituency. It is taken, lock stock and barrel, from a Government document called the toolkit for falling rolls, which mentions the three relevant characteristics as being found by Ofsted in schools with falling rolls; but that is not a criticism that can readily be levelled at the four schools in my constituency. In less strident language, the county council draws attention to its concerns that the four schools may not be able to deliver the national curriculum, and that they may have weak leadership and governance. Those three observations, of course, do not derive from direct observation of the schools, but are taken from the Government toolkit on falling rolls.

The county council has always said that transforming learning communities is not about saving money. However, the document that it has produced, and of which I have a copy, makes it clear—and draws specific attention to the fact—that educating pupils in village schools is more expensive than educating pupils in urban areas. We all know that, but we also know that it should not be a barrier to pupils' attendance at their village school to get the excellent education that it provides. Those arguments have all been put to Cheshire county council, which has not taken cognisance of the strength of feeling in the villages.

That leads me to a very important issue. If the schools do not have falling rolls and are not facing surplus school places in future, if they are full and buoyant and Ofsted has given them a good report, and if parents clearly want to send their children to those village schools, why does the county council propose to merge them? The county council has come up with a figure; it says that most primary schools should aspire to have 110 pupils, and the fact that those four schools have fallen below that figure is one reason put forward for their amalgamation.

I would refer the county council to another important document produced by the Department for Education and Skills, entitled "Schools organisation changes" which is drawn up for decision makers. Paragraph 52 of that document is specific. It states:

"There is 'a presumption against the closure of rural schools.'"

It goes on to say it does not mean that rural schools should never close, but it sets out strict criteria about what needs to be in place should a local authority propose closing a village school and the arguments that it should provide to the school organisation committee. It draws specific attention to transport.

The parents of the children in my four rural schools can currently walk their children to school. If Alvanley or Manley schools were to close, it would mean a two-mile journey for the pupils. There is no public transport, so the parents will have no choice but to take them by car. The same applies to Kingsley St. John's or Norley Church of England primary schools; if they were to close, transport would be a problem.

I asked the county council whether, when making its initial proposals, it had taken account of the impact that closing any of those schools would have on the wider village communities. Quite straightforwardly, it said that it had not but that it would do so when it undertook formal, statutory consultation. Again, the county council is being remiss in not recognising the role that primary schools play in the life of the community.

The document also talks about federation. All four schools have said that they would like to consider that option. I have to tell my right hon. Friend the Minister that the parents in Manley, Alvanley, Norley and Kingsley do not want federation. They all want their village schools to stay open. The governing bodies of the four schools have gone for federation because they think that it is the only way to save their schools.

My view is that if there is a true consultation—one about transforming learning communities, improving education and sustaining rural communities—the status quo must be an option. I accept that the status quo is not an option for the entire county and that things will have to change. However, no case has been made for the amalgamation or federation of those four schools, or for the closure of two of them, or even all four. The parents are right. They should have the option of federation.

The volume of opinion in the four villages—what people are saying in support of the four schools and in response to the county council's initial consultation—should give the council pause for thought. It should take stock and reconsider the issue. I would be reassured if, at its meeting tomorrow, the county council decided to consult properly; the decision would need to be confirmed by the executive committee on 19 December. If it put all the options on the table—the status quo, amalgamation and confederation—it would go some way to addressing the villagers' fears.

The county council has not given an educational reason why any of the four schools should be faced with the threat of closure. I hope that when my right hon. Friend replies to the debate, she will be able reassure me about Government policy, because when the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) was shadow spokesman for education he wrote to one of my constituents and tried to blame the Labour Government for what is going on in Tory-controlled Cheshire county council.

I have never wanted to make a political issue of all this. It is not one. It is about what we should do in the 21st century for primary school kids in my constituency. They should still be able to go to schools that serve their villages, and some of those schools have been doing just that for more than 120 years.

1.39 pm

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I thank the Minister for allowing me to speak in the debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall). Apart from being an hon. Friend and a genuine friend, he is also my Member of Parliament.

Mr. Mike Hall: I have some troublesome constituents.

Andrew Miller: My hon. Friend gets some awkward letters from me.

Alvanley, one of the schools that he mentioned, is in the village where I live, and my wife is a member of the governing body, so I am accountable through that route as well. The project affects the whole of Cheshire. The county council has split the county into a number of sub-units and intends between now and the end of 2006 to complete its review. I have said from the outset, in respect of the parts of the review that impact on my constituency, including those that overlap with the constituency of my hon. Friend, that it is absurd that they should be dealt with in isolation. My hon. Friend suggested a two-stage approach. I do not think that any irrevocable decisions should be taken until the whole county has been reviewed. That would be illogical; we would create fixed borders between the sub-areas of the county, and if a decision were taken in, for example, Weaver Vale that affected Chester or Ellesmere Port and Neston, illogical decisions might be made in relation to schools that were close to the border because they had been dealt with in different blocks. There ought to be fuzzy borders, and a different approach will have to be adopted if that is to work.

I concur with my hon. Friend in questioning the methodology. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will undertake to check whether the approach being adopted by Cheshire in respect of predicted population figures is sound—there are statisticians who would argue otherwise. In my constituency, the review has produced a bit of a curate's egg. There are some welcome parts and some that will cause serious problems, not because of the rural make-up that my hon. Friend described but because no explanation has been offered as to what will happen to schools such as Gorsthill and Mansefield, which have served the community well for a long time, Mansefield with a multiple learning disability unit. Gorsthill has a dangerous fast road.

Mr. Hall: One thing in the review of which I am critical is the lack of any real thought about special educational needs. When I challenged the county council about that, I was told that it will review the special needs of individual pupils. In my hon. Friend's constituency, two schools are affected by the review, both of which have provision for special needs.

Andrew Miller: My hon. Friend is right. That raises a legitimate question against the proposals. There are major implications for the secondary sector. One of the proposals involves two centres for 11-to-14 year-olds and a 14-to-19 academy. That must be reinforced with very substantial sums from central Government. I have not been consulted about my views, either directly by the Government or indirectly through the county council. I hope that Members of Parliament will be engaged directly with the issue.

My final observation concerns a small school, Dunham Hill. It is a tiny little village school with a unique feature: over the years it has developed a specialist unit to provide education for the children of Travellers. It is unique. The current proposal is that the school should be closed and moved, lock stock and barrel, into Horns Mill in my hon. Friend's constituency. That might be perfectly logical in terms of numbers, because Dunham Hill does not meet the 100 criterion. However, one has to ask whether it makes sense in terms of broader social policy considerations, because it will jeopardise the effort that has been made over the last 10 to 15 years by successive county council administrations to integrate Travellers' children into mainstream education, which is now showing success in getting some youngsters into the secondary sector. I do not believe it is possible to pick up such a unit and physically move it, and I have concerns about it.

I fully understand my hon. Friend's comments about rural schools, and, like him, I do not want to make this a political issue, but we find it a tad amusing to see signs popping up all around the county that say "Save our schools"—we must remind people that this is all about saving our schools from a Tory county council.

The issue is complex; there must be change in some parts of the county, but I hope that the Minister will use her good offices to intervene to ensure that the changes that take place make sense in all the policy areas that my hon. Friend described, which have an impact on children in the communities.

1.46 pm

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall) on securing the debate, from which it is evident that there is great interest among local people in Cheshire's transforming learning communities initiative, and particularly on the impact that it may have on primary and secondary school provision in my hon. Friend's constituency and in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller). My hon. Friends and other stakeholders in the local community should and will have an important role in considering the issues. It is good to see local MPs not only ably defending their constituencies but being willing to see the coherence of the plans throughout the area.

Changes to school provision in a district are essentially matters for local decision, as the local authority has the statutory responsibility for planning school places and for proposing to close schools and open new ones. The local authority has a statutory duty to ensure that there are sufficient places and that high quality education is provided in a cost-effective way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale rightly put great emphasis on the quality of the primary education that will be provided in his constituency, which must be at the heart of any proposals or changes made. The Department's five-year strategy for children and learners, which followed from our primary document "Excellence and Enjoyment—A Strategy for Primary Schools" sets out the success story of primary education, with many schools delivering high-quality education. Impressive strides in literacy and numeracy have been made in recent years, and teaching has improved in every curriculum in primary schools since 1997.

My hon. Friend is right to say that overall primary standards in Frodsham and Helsby are good and broadly in line with the average for all Cheshire schools. In Cheshire as a whole, key stage 1 and 2 results are above the national average. No primary schools in Frodsham and Helsby have been identified as requiring special measures, having serious weaknesses or as under-achieving. The staff and governors at Alvanley, Manley, Kingsley St. John's and Norley primary schools are doing an excellent job in ensuring that the work continues for my hon. Friend's constituents.

Cheshire county council is reviewing primary and secondary school places in Frodsham and Helsby because of the surplus places that exist in both sectors. The county council has informed me it is undertaking public consultations on the proposals for schools in Frodsham and Helsby. It is important that the process allows for the consideration of alternative proposals put forward by local stakeholders with an interest in education. Clearly, both my hon. Friends are concerned about and involved in that. Hon. Members must be involved. We recently changed the guidance on schools organisation to ensure that local Members are fully engaged in decisions. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston that he will be consulted about any academy proposals in his constituency.

Later this month, the Cheshire schools panel will consider the outcome of the consultations and will make recommendations to the executive of the council on which proposals to recommend for publication. The executive will then decide whether to authorise publication of statutory proposals setting out any planned changes. There will then be a formal process, which must be carried out, which I will outline in a moment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale concentrated particularly on the possible amalgamations involving his four primary schools. He outlined the need to ensure that the proposal to close the secondary school in his constituency is dovetailed with proposals for other changes and that considerations of the knock-on effect of any closure on where young people and families will receive their secondary education is important. In the Government's view, any changes to school organisation should focus on boosting standards and opportunities for young people while matching school place supply as closely as possible to pupil and parental needs and wishes.

The Education Act 1996 places a duty on each local education authority to ensure that sufficient school places exist to meet the needs of the local population in order to promote high standards of attainment for all pupils. If an authority decides to reorganise provision, decisions will not be taken by Ministers but will be decided locally, as Cheshire county council is starting to do. As I indicated, the proposals are at public consultation and have not yet moved into the statutory phase. All interested parties must be consulted before proposals are published by the authority, provided with sufficient information and allowed adequate time in which to respond. If there is a decision to proceed with closure proposals for individual schools, formal notices must be published in a local newspaper, posted at the main entrances of the schools named in the proposals and placed locally in another conspicuous place. There is then a six-week period in which people can submit representations in support of or against the proposals, except in the case of a school in special measures, when the period is one month, although that clearly is not the case in my hon. Friend's constituency.

If the authority publishes the proposals and there are no objections, it may proceed and implement them. In all other cases, such as those for which objections are received and those concerning voluntary-aided schools, the proposals are referred to the school organisation committee, which is made up of five or six groups, each representing major stakeholders in the provision of education, including the diocesan bodies. Each group has one vote and must consider all evidence in line with the guidance issued by the Secretary of State before reaching a decision. If a unanimous decision cannot be reached, the case is referred to the independent schools adjudicator for final decision.

Guidance for those publishing and deciding proposals for changes to local school organisation makes it clear that the Government are committed to greater personalisation and choice, with learners and parents at centre-stage, but that must be set in the context of raising standards.

Andrew Miller: Does the consultation requirement extend to proposals for infant and junior schools to merge?

Jacqui Smith: Yes, it absolutely does. The proposals that my hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale mentioned on the four primary schools would involve the statutory process that I have outlined. Our guidance on those changes states that decisions must be made in light of a range of factors, including potential impact on local standards, contribution to diversity, views of interested parties and cost effectiveness.

My hon. Friend made some important points about rural schools, which make an important contribution to their local area. They are often at the heart of rural communities, as my hon. Friend said. Closing a rural school can have effects well beyond the schooling of children. That is why we introduced a presumption against closing rural schools in 1998. Before that, an average of 30 rural schools a year were approved for closure. This has now reduced to an average of five. Of course, the presumption against closure does not mean that no rural school will ever close, but it ensures that there must be a strong case for closing a small rural school, and closure must be in the best overall interest of education in the local area.

As my hon. Friend said, the decision maker's guidance on statutory proposals requires local authorities or governing bodies that propose a rural school closure to provide evidence to show that they have considered a range of factors, including transport implications, alternatives to closure and the impact on the community. We also expect authorities to take full account of our proposals on primary education, as set out in the five-year strategy, when planning for primary school provision.

As for the review of primary and secondary schools in the Frodsham and Helsby area of my hon. Friend's constituency, he identified the arguments made by the local authority on surplus places. Surplus places can represent a poor use of resources that could be used more effectively to support schools in raising standards. In the light of a downward trend in the number of pupils in primary education and the resultant impact on secondary schools, that is a national and local concern. That is why we have developed, in conjunction with the Audit Commission, a web-based toolkit which offers a range of practical advice and guidance on dealing with falling rolls. Where pupil numbers fall below 150, the guidance states that schools may have to take some difficult decisions to maintain the quality of education, including considering the introduction of mixed-age teaching. However, I emphasise to my hon. Friend that the guidance does not state that a school should not have mixed-age teaching, or that that would be a reason for closure or reorganisation.

Mr. Mike Hall: I think that there are some strong educational merits in mixed-age teaching, certainly in primary schools. I am also certain that, where head teachers of primary schools have teaching commitments, those schools are better for it.

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend may well be right. The important point is that there is no central Government instruction; it is a decision that must be taken in the light of the quality of local provision. Indeed, while the latest Ofsted report for Cheshire local education authority states that performance in managing the supply of school places is unsatisfactory, the reduction of surplus places is not a matter for central Government; it is a matter for local decision making and we do not issue instructions on that matter. It is very much a matter for individual authorities to decide whether and how they reduce levels of surplus places, taking into account local circumstances, including school performance, as well as geographical and social factors. That is what my hon. Friend is exhorting Cheshire to do.

Both my hon. Friends made important points about the need to ensure that any changes made locally take into consideration the impact on standards, parental views, coherent provision across constituencies, and the impact on special educational needs. My hon. Friends have provided an important voice for local people. As the proposals proceed, it will be important that consultation, in line with the statutory approach that the Government have set out, ensures that the voice of local people is clearly heard.

Agriculture (Northern Ireland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Kevin Brennan.]

9.30 am

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): I am grateful for this opportunity to debate one of the most important subjects for the people of Northern Ireland: the state of Northern Ireland agriculture. Agriculture is three times more important to the Northern Ireland economy than it is to the UK economy as a whole.

The industry in Northern Ireland is predominately grass-based, with grazing livestock accounting for almost two thirds of gross industry output. The poultry, pig, cereal and potato sectors also have a significant part to play in the Northern Ireland agri-food industry.

In Northern Ireland, there are more than 28,000 farms, half of which are large enough to have at least one full-time employee. As in other regions of the UK, there have been great changes to the agricultural sector, resulting in many farms merging and becoming larger. The 3,800 largest farms account for 57 per cent. of all on-farm economic activity, for 82 per cent. of the dairy population, for 80 per cent. of the pig population and for 61 per cent. of the poultry population. That restructuring has resulted in the total number of farms falling by approximately 1 to 2 per cent. per annum, reflecting the fact that fewer younger people are entering the industry and that more elderly people are leaving their lifelong profession, handed down from generation to generation. In my contribution, I shall identify problems and express my concern about the fact that fewer young people are entering the industry.

Although the age profile of farmers has not significantly changed over the past decade—the average age of farmers is 55—it is noteworthy that farmers on larger holdings have a younger age profile than those on smaller holdings. It is vital that those on larger farms are given the help and assistance that they require to survive well into the future. If those large holdings do not have a secure and viable long-term future, I am genuinely afraid that the agri-food sector, Northern Ireland's largest employer, will become unsustainable.

Northern Ireland farmers supply the many food processing companies in the Province. Also, a large volume of milk is exported from Northern Ireland to the Republic of Ireland for further processing. The food industry has a gross turnover of over £2 billion per annum, and it accounts for approximately 21 per cent. of the total for the Northern Ireland manufacturing sector. The largest two sub-sectors—milk and milk products, and beef and sheep meat—account for almost 50 per cent. of the industry's turnover, reflecting the importance of those commodities in Northern Ireland's primary production.

The processing sector is heavily dependent on external markets, with sales outside Northern Ireland accounting for well over half the industry's turnover. It is not fully recognised that the food industry exceeds the performance of many other sectors of the economy. The agri-food industry is vital to the Northern Ireland economy as a whole.

I turn to the key problems facing the Northern Ireland farming community. A number of key policy decisions are currently being debated at local, national, European and global level; they will have a massive impact on how the agri-food industry survives in future, and on farmers in Northern Ireland.

The first issue is the Government's attack on the common agricultural policy, and the EU budget and World Trade Organisation discussions. In the past few months we have listened to the UK Government link any possible deal on the EU budget with a further reform of the CAP. I have to say that, at a time when the Government are chairing the EU presidency, the policy is flawed and will ultimately damage the agri-food sector, not just in Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK, but throughout Europe.

I urge the Government not to surrender the UK rebate won by a previous Government and not to accept a deal that will be bad not only for UK agriculture but for the UK economy. When the CAP was reformed in 2003, it was sold to UK farmers in the guise of something that would prepare Europe for a world trade deal. In Northern Ireland, we are already starting to see how the reformed CAP is impacting on the Northern Ireland farming industry.

Due to a reduction in export refunds for milk products, milk prices received by United Dairy Farmers, the largest milk processor in Northern Ireland, are 10 per cent. lower than this time last year. Over the coming months, many dairy farmers will struggle to survive as the price they get paid for their produce continues to decline. They will face losses rather than break even if that decline continues. Given the many hours that farmers spend on the farm, working for nothing is not practical and will drive many to the wall. A further reform of the CAP would undoubtedly mean support for agriculture being further removed, and I fear that that would result in many farmers turning their backs on the land. That will have a negative impact not just on the economy but on the management and sustainability of our rural areas.

This week finds us in the midst of the world trade summit in Hong Kong. The current proposals being tabled by the EU Commissioner, Mr. Mandelson, and supported by the UK Government, will jeopardise the whole rural infrastructure throughout Northern Ireland. They will lead to a reduction in import tariffs for products coming into the EU, and will result in further cuts of export refunds for products leaving it. That will have major consequences for both the beef and dairy sectors in Northern Ireland. I am also concerned that before a final deal is reached, further ground will yet be conceded and farmers will suffer even greater hardship.

This summer, beef prices collapsed in Northern Ireland as a direct result of the importation of high-value beef cuts from regions such as south America. My hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) will no doubt touch on the point if he is able to catch your eye, Mr. Cook.

[Dr. William McCrea]

The Mandelson proposal envisages current import tariffs being reduced by a further 50 per cent. The impact of that would decimate the market, and with a reduction in export refunds for exports going outside the EU, the impact on livestock prices would be dramatic, resulting in a loss of producer confidence. Given that consequence, there could be a mass exodus from both dairy and suckler production, and the slaughtering of the dairy and suckler herds which have taken decades to build up.

I challenge the Minister today: is she content with the depopulation of livestock numbers throughout the United Kingdom? Are the Government satisfied with leaving the job of supplying the food for the UK to another nation? What will happen when there is a global pandemic of a disease such as bird flu or foot and mouth? What will happen when there is a major natural disaster in one of the countries on which we rely to provide us with our food? What will happen if bioterrorism affects the food imported into this country?

Returning to the reform of the CAP, I say to the Minister that farmers have had to meet strict environmental and animal welfare standards. Are those same conditions and standards being requested from other countries that supply us with our food? My hon. Friends and I have grave doubts about that; we believe that other countries that sell their food in Northern Ireland and under cut prices are not meeting the standards, and that strict animal welfare and environmental conditions are not being met. Those are serious matters, to which the Government ought to give serious consideration.

In Northern Ireland, the implementation of stringent environmental legislation is causing considerable concern. Currently, both the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Department of the Environment are discussing with the European Commission how best to implement the nitrates directive in Northern Ireland. My view is similar to that of many farmers: the environment should be protected from pollution. However, I harbour concerns that the implementation of the nitrates and water framework directives will result in a massive cost to the industry without any proper environmental gain.

The implementation of the nitrates directive will cause massive problems for the dairy sector and the intensive pig and poultry sector in Northern Ireland. Those problems cannot be overstated; neither should they be underestimated. In early July 2005, I gave a guarded welcome to the announcement made by the agriculture Minister, Lord Rooker, of a reduction in the closed period required for organic manures and to account being taken of producers who out-winter livestock, rent winter accommodation and use straw bedding. I was disappointed to learn that the Commission was not willing to accept the points given to DARD at that time.

Several issues need to be addressed before the action programme is formally submitted to Brussels. It is vital that the closed period for organic manures should be kept to a bare minimum. I would have preferred to see a system that allowed the spreading of slurry according to the prevalent climate conditions and those forecast by the Met Office. That seems more logical than using dates on the calendar to decide when and when not to spread slurry.

The current proposal, which will prevent slurry from being spread on land whose gradient is greater than 20 per cent., is also open to challenge. Its very nature shows how detached policy makers, even those in DARD and the DOE, can become from the reality on the ground. I would welcome a commitment from the Minister that the Government will reconsider the proposal to ensure that farmers can spread organic manure on land, even if the gradient of that land is greater than 20 per cent.

Another measure included in the proposed action programme which will severely limit the area of land available for spreading organic manures is the ban on the spreading of manure within 10 m of any other waterway. Do the Government realise that the majority of fields in Northern Ireland are small and have open drains? To have a policy that means that manure cannot be spread with 10 m of a waterway is totally illogical and, in many ways, impractical. Will the Minister give a commitment to look afresh at the matter and ensure that when the regulation is implemented, there will still be some available land left for the spreading of organic manure?

Another concern is phosphates. I recognise that traditionally there has been a surplus of phosphates in fertilisers and animal feeds used in Northern Ireland. However, the farming industry has already taken major steps to reduce the levels of phosphates included in fertilisers and animal feeds. That alone should help to address the phosphate imbalance that has traditionally existed. I oppose the introduction of individual farm phosphate balances from 2007. In the longer term, it is vital that the Government find alternative uses for animal manures, particularly from the intensive pig and poultry sector.

I welcome the group that has been set up in Northern Ireland and tasked with addressing that issue. However, much of the European legislation that the group is addressing has been on the statute book for years, so it is rather late in the day to set up the group, although it is welcome. That should have been done within the Department years ago. It is equally important that there is appropriate financial backing to deliver projects that will provide an alternative use for organic manure produced by the intensive sector. Without that, the measures will be impractical.

I welcome the announcement earlier this year of the £45 million earmarked to help farmers to make necessary adjustments to their holdings to cater for the implementation of the nitrates directive. However, there are a number of changes that could result in the farm nutrient management scheme providing better value for money. My party has called on the Government to introduce a roofing scheme to reduce the dirty water collected on farms instead of constructing additional storage capacity. The Government should not delay the scheme but seek to introduce it at the earliest opportunity.

I have received numerous complaints regarding the specification of tanks funded under the farm nutrient management scheme. I often wonder whether the current specification required from farmers is above that required under the slurry and fuel oil regulations. It is vital that, when DARD is providing 60 per cent. grant aid for the construction of tanks, it does not gold-plate the building specifications. I always find that when regulations are introduced to deal with issues that have emanated from Europe, the UK Government gold-plate the legislation, rather than trying to bring the Community along with them.

I remember one of the issues that we faced in the crisis in the pig industry. Another noble Lord was the Minister at that time, and I remember begging him to save the industry from total collapse. He told me that European legislation would not permit that; no help could be given. However, France gave help to its farmers. I pointed out to the Minister that a great European country, France, the leader of Europe, was giving help and asked why the United Kingdom—we are looked on as poor Europeans who do not know whether we are in or out of Europe—could not help its farmers.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): The issue of gold-plating is of concern to all industries in the United Kingdom. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we should put tremendous pressure on those responsible for the interpretation of European directives to ensure that they do not interpret them to the maximum extent but reflect the spirit of what they are intended to achieve?

Dr. McCrea: I absolutely agree with that sensible comment. A balance has to be struck, but there is a desire to prove something to Europe by gold-plating legislation coming from Europe instead of dealing with the spirit of its intention, so the UK tries to maximise the legislation, instead of having a balanced reaction to it. That causes grave concern to industry in general and to agriculture in Northern Ireland in particular, bearing it in mind that some of the legislation could destroy the industry completely.

To return to the case of the pig farmers, at that time, we were begging our Government to save an industry that was going down. Many farmers had been encouraged to spend money by the Department. They did so and found that the Department left them high and dry when they were up to their eyes in debt. Many of them went under. In fact, farmers committed suicide because of the tremendous debt they faced because of the Department's encouragement and because, when they were faced with a crisis, they were deserted. There is now another crisis.

I come to the end of my earlier story. When I spoke to the then Minister about the crisis in the pig industry, I said to him that the difference between the French Government and ours was that they would save the pig industry but ours would have it destroyed. In many ways, that was true because of the number of farmers who were totally destroyed at that time. It was not their fault. If one could say that they had contributed to their situation, it would have been their fault, but it was totally out of their control. There was a fire in one of the major factories; it seemed that one thing after another happened, and the pig industry was in a terrible situation.

I referred earlier to finding alternative uses for slurry, particularly in the intensive pig and poultry sector. Instead of forcing farmers to invest large sums in putting up storage, it would be more economical to consider investing the money in a system that would process the slurry into a valuable by-product. That is more rational and acceptable, and would be more acceptable to the environmental lobbies in Europe and elsewhere.

There are also small producers who cannot afford the adjustment to meet the new environmental legislation. Surely, urgent consideration should be given to the introduction of an out-goers scheme. Let us take the example of a small pig farmer who is asked to put up thousands upon thousands of pounds, to which the Government will add £30,000 or £40,000, to put in tanks in which to keep slurry. If he were given a certain amount of money to go out of the industry, because he would not be viable in the long run, it would be a more rational way of spending the money, and more helpful to the industry than giving him that first sum. Will the Minister ask the Department to consider the introduction of an out-goers scheme for the smaller producers who cannot afford the adjustment? Otherwise, they will have to apply for and take grants to keep going at least for a short period.

Before leaving the issue of implementing the nitrates directive, I ask the Minister to provide me with two assurances. First, will the Government give farmers more time to adjust to the new regulations? It is unacceptable that farmers have only until next August to complete all the works and submit the receipts to DARD. In reality, it is not practical and it cannot happen within that short time. Given that the Government still have to finalise the action programme and decide whether to introduce a roofing scheme for farmers, surely the additional time could be given.

Secondly, I should welcome a commitment from the Government that Lord Rooker, the Minister in charge of DARD and DOE, will take a more proactive role in the negotiations. It is essential that the Minister lobbies on the issue to get the best possible deal for the industry.

I spoke in the House the other day about the other side of the agriculture industry: fishing. Major debates are upcoming in Europe about quotas and how to deal with the fishing industry, yet I am led to believe that our Minister will not be present. It is vital that he takes an active role, batting in Europe for the farmers, taking on the battle himself and not leaving it to the officials. The Minister has good batting power, and I trust that he will lobby on those issues on behalf of the farming industry in Northern Ireland. Other pieces of environmental legislation likely to impact on Northern Ireland's agri-food industry are the water framework directive, integrated pollution prevention and control—the IPPC—and the climate change levy.

I welcome the issuing of single payments to many producers in Northern Ireland. However, with time running out, I encourage DARD to ensure that the maximum number of payments can be made to farmers before the end of 2005. There is some disappointment that, according to DARD's timetable, approximately one third of producers will not receive any other farm payment this year. I was also disappointed that only 75 per cent. of the single farm payment was issued to farmers in Northern Ireland, whereas 80 per cent. of it was issued to producers in Wales. If it can be done in Wales, it can be done in Northern Ireland. I wish my

[Dr. McCrea]

Welsh colleagues well, and I am happy for them, but I am looking for the same happiness for the Northern Ireland farmer.

Although many farmers have already received their single farm payment for 2005, many are still apprehensive about the inspection procedures under cross-compliance. It is vital that the inspection process is not over-zealous, and that the farmers are not severely penalised for minor non-compliance.

I turn to the potato sector. Despite the area of ground that is planted in potatoes decreasing annually, the sector still has a key role in the Northern Ireland agri-food industry. Although I do not agree entirely with everything in the recent Quinn report, "Review of Support Arrangements to the Northern Ireland Potato Sector", I believe that it could act as a basis for driving the potato sector forward. Northern Ireland traditionally had a lucrative seed potato sector. It is therefore vital that DARD puts increased resources into supporting this sector, to ensure that the critical mass remains in place to keep the sector viable.

Until there is an agreement over the EU budget, we still do not know how much money will be available for rural development in Northern Ireland for the period 2007–13. We do, however, know that the budget will be significantly less than that in the current round of funding. The rural development fund includes measures to boost farmland biodiversity, to restructure the rural economy and to improve the quality of life in rural areas. These constitute tangible public benefits that will support the EU's social and environmental objectives. However, this budget has been cut by 25 per cent., compared with the Commission's original proposal.

In the future, it is likely that that share of the rural development spend will be funded through compulsory and voluntary modulation of the single farm payment. It is therefore vital that the larger farmer who is likely to have contributed a greater amount of modulated funds in the first place is able to receive some funds through rural development. There is an opportunity here for intensive farmers to get some assistance to meet standards through rural development.

There is a significant lobby for rural development money to be spent on wider rural society. I support more funds going to rural schools, roads and health care. I also believe that the Government should be spending core budget funds on these areas, rather than targeting rural development money.

The future of the agri-food industry in Northern Ireland depends on young people coming into the industry. I welcome the new entrants scheme for Northern Ireland and hope that it encourages many young people into the industry. Despite all the negativity, I believe that there will be a bright future for those who are willing to adapt to new circumstances.

A number of changes could be made to the new entrants scheme that would help to encourage more people to avail themselves of it. I would like to see a mixture of a lump sum payment and a low-interest loan available under the scheme. I would also like other young people who commenced agricultural activity over the last five years to be able to avail themselves of the scheme.

If it is right that we have a scheme that encourages new entrants, it is also right to have a scheme that encourages and enables older people to move out and allow the younger people to get in. We are talking about an industry here—although the Government refer to it as an industry only when it suits—and in the past a farm enterprise was able to finance not only the older generation, but the incoming farmer and the new generation too. Quite often, two or even three families could be sustained on a farm holding. That is no more. Even the larger holdings could sustain only one family. Therefore, it is vital to encourage young people to come in and to encourage older people out. That can be done only if we have a scheme that allows it to happen.

I should like to say something about the high calibre of young people in the industry. For over 80 years, Queen's university, Belfast, has been training graduates in a degree in agriculture and they have gone on to lead the industry throughout Northern Ireland and further afield. It is vital that one of our main universities in Northern Ireland provides a high-quality agriculture degree to train young people for the largest industry in the Province. Others offer quality training for young people coming into the industry, but if one of our main universities does not offer an agriculture degree, we will not attract our brightest students and they will go elsewhere to qualify.

Will the Minister make it a priority to ensure that one of our universities offers a pure agriculture-based degree? I am concerned that in years to come the best export from the industry will be our young people, who are committed and interested in it but will go elsewhere to be trained. We cannot afford a brain drain from the agri-food sector in the Province.

In conclusion, I shall deal with renewable energy policy. DARD is currently consulting on a renewable energy policy for Northern Ireland. That strategy, together with the recent announcement of a £50 million budget to be spent on renewable energy in Northern Ireland over the next two years, will help renew interest in considering alternative land uses in Northern Ireland. I welcome this innovative move by the Government. With the current trend towards the globalisation of food products and massive increases in the price of oil and gas, many farmers look forward to the day when alternative land uses, such as planting oil seed rape for biodiesel or planting biomass for bio-remediation, will be economically viable. The Government's recent announcement regarding their renewable transport fuel obligations will hopefully allow some farmers in Northern Ireland to diversify into these new niche markets.

I am grateful to have had the opportunity to draw hon. Members' attention to the importance of this industry. Many are the challenges that the industry is facing. I believe that Northern Ireland farmers are willing to face, and meet, those challenges. There is a future; I am simply asking the Government to ensure that they do all within their power to give the farmers that future.

10.8 am

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) on securing the debate. I listened carefully; he covered nearly every point of agriculture, including the fertiliser that goes on the grass. I have to congratulate him on going into so much detail, because agriculture is an important industry in Northern Ireland.

My background in the agricultural business is 25 years in the meat industry. With my youthful looks, people find it hard to believe that I have been in it for 25 years, but that is so.

Dr. McCrea: They would certainly believe it given your size.

David Simpson: Someone told me that it is good to be a positive advertisement for the industry. It took an awful lot of money to put it here.

Dr. McCrea: It would cost a lot of money to take it away, too.

David Simpson: It would be a shame to lose it.

The beef industry has gone through hard times, and I would like to comment on that. I will do so briefly, as I know that the Minister is eager to start answering all the questions that have been put to her. I welcome the Government's announcement last week that £1.3 million will be put aside to assist Northern Ireland's beef industry. It is to be hoped that that, along with the money available under the fit-for-market initiative, will help to find new markets for the sector. However, I was disappointed that the Government did not provide more money to compensate for the beef special premium scale-back for 2004.

The beef industry's finding new markets is solely dependent on the UK getting rid of the beef export ban. My party is actively engaged in seeking that. Only yesterday, our colleague, Mr. Jim Allister MEP, met the European Commissioner for Health and Consumer Protection, Markos Kyprianou, to discuss this issue. It is clear that the UK has now taken all necessary steps to satisfy both the Food Standards Agency and EU officials that beef from these regions is safe to eat. However, I must also say that I am disappointed that the UK Government have not taken a more proactive stance on the issue during their presidency of the EU.

With the removal of the over-30-months scheme and the introduction of the older cattle disposal scheme in the latter half of January, there will be a significant increase in the number of cattle coming on to the UK domestic market. My party has already lobbied both the European Commission and the Government on keeping the OTM scheme in place until the market opens up for beef exports. That would prevent a glut of beef from coming on to the UK market and continuing to depress beef prices, as has been the case over the past months. Can the Minister confirm that the Government are pushing for the lifting of the beef export ban at the earliest opportunity? Are they also lobbying for the OTM scheme to remain in place until the export ban is lifted? Those are two vital components that must go together.

On the subject of beef exports, and on the assumption that the export ban will be lifted at the earliest opportunity, I wish to mention live animal exports. I understand that that is an emotive subject in the UK and that we cannot ignore animal welfare issues. However, it is essential for the live animal export market to be opened up for Northern Ireland, alongside the beef export ban being removed.

Northern Ireland is the only part of the UK that has a land border with another member state, and it is traditional for animals to be traded between the two countries. I was encouraged by the recent announcement by the noble Lord Rooker supporting the case for live animal exports from Northern Ireland. In 1995, the last year that Northern Ireland was allowed to export bovine animals, the value of that trade to the economy was placed at some £34.6 million. Currently, in Northern Ireland, dairy-bred male animals are being humanely slaughtered at birth, which is disgraceful. There is no viable market for these animals in the United Kingdom.

Over the 12-month period ending 30 September 2005, there were 64,953 animals of dairy sires registered on the database. Only recently did DARD adjust its rural portal to facilitate the humane slaughter of those young calves. If there were live animal exports, and these animals were exported to the Republic of Ireland rather than being humanely done away with at birth, they would be worth approximately £50 per head, which would make an awful difference to the farming community. It is therefore vital to the Northern Ireland economy that the export market re-opens for live cattle.

In an era where farmers are compensated for environmental and animal welfare management, instead of given direct production-linked subsidies, it is difficult to see how the primary producer and processor can survive with current market prices. It is vital that there is an open and communicative supply chain that will help achieve closer relationships between the primary producer, the processor and the consumer. In my lifetime in the industry, I have always preached that that should be the case. For many years, it was a "them and us" situation between the farmers and processors. That has to change, but I believe that it will because the pressure coming on to the industry will inevitably make it happen, and that is vital. To survive in future, the primary production sector must be competitive and profitable. For that to happen, the major multiple retailers need to pass more money down the food chain to processors and, ultimately, to the primary producer.

The current retailer code of practice has clearly failed the agricultural community, not just in Northern Ireland, but throughout the whole United Kingdom. Strengthening that code is vital so that a greater percentage of revenue coming from the food chain is passed down the line. The Office of Fair Trading should not only scrutinise the major multiples but investigate those companies' suppliers. I am concerned that monopolies can be created—if they have not been already—in the supplier sector of major retailers, due to their adoption of single sourcing policies in the United Kingdom.

Dr. McCrea: Does my hon. Friend agree that in Northern Ireland there has been a major bone of contention, in that while the housewife continued to pay high prices for the products on the shelves of these large retailers, in reality many producing farmers were receiving a price at the farm gate that did not even cover their costs? That bone of contention remains; therefore, there should be a major inquiry into that whole position. There is sufficient cake for everyone, but the issue is the division of it. Does my hon. Friend agree that an inquiry would be helpful?

David Simpson: I agree 100 per cent. with my hon. Friend's comments. Recent television programmes have shown the situation; he mentioned the pig sector, about which a programme was made. It showed how much it took to produce a pig up to a certain stage and how much people were losing by doing so. They took that same pig and transferred it into the retail side at the supermarkets; the price for the same weight was 10 times more. There is no doubt that we need an inquiry and we need fair play. That returns to my earlier point that it is imperative that there is a closer working relationship between the processor, the producer and the consumer. That must be done for the industry to survive. I hope that the Minister will take my points on board.

My hon. Friend mentioned waste material and the renewable energy methods that need to be examined in the industry. A system called anaerobic digesters is currently being researched and operated in Northern Ireland. A company is experimenting, trying to develop an anaerobic digester that will take much of the waste material that he spoke of, along with the blood and other animal waste from the meat plants, not only from the beef sector but from the pork and poultry sectors. It will make a viable fertiliser for the ground, which will deal with the nitrates problem and all the difficulties in the industry.

However, the company has come up against some difficulties, which derive from the lack of investment. It is a family with a private farm who have moved into this area and are forward thinking. Some problems have been caused for local residents, involving the odours coming from the plant. It is important that, although we are trying to help the company develop an anaerobic digester, we take on board the concerns of residents.

My hon. Friend mentioned the money that has been put aside by the Government to examine different sources and alternative uses for waste material. I would encourage them to consider helping the company to do further research in this area. We have in Northern Ireland one or two rendering plants for disposing of dead animals and other waste, but that is not the future; the future is anaerobic digestion, which we need to examine closely. I ask the Government to examine it and perhaps to contact the company to see whether there is any way that it can be helped. I know that Lord Rooker wrote a letter to the company and that it was not too promising. Will the Minister use her influence to see whether something can be done? It is obviously the future for the industry.

Lorely Burt: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is aware that funding for anaerobic digestion and for development of the use of slurry is available to other parts of the United Kingdom under the national industrial symbiosis programme, but that no funding has been allocated to Northern Ireland. I have written to the Minister to ask why. I will discuss her answer to my question at more length in my speech; otherwise I run the risk of making too long an intervention. I just mention that to find out whether the hon. Gentleman is aware of it.

David Simpson: I thank the hon. Lady for that information. I had heard that the money was not going to Northern Ireland, but I thank her for confirming it. The Government need to consider the issue in order to help the situation, and they need to think of the future.

Dr. McCrea: Returning to the situation that my hon. Friend talked about, it is a lot easier for the Department to close places down—that is an easy way out—than to help them to overcome their problems. There are problems in the community that need to be taken seriously and overcome, but we need to deal with the underlying problems, rather than simply close down a company to get rid of a problem, and that certainly requires Government help.

David Simpson: I agree. I encourage the Minister to use her influence. Perhaps she will even agree to a meeting with the company of which I spoke, or to receive representations from it and from me, to find out whether there is a way forward. I honestly believe that anaerobic digestion is the way forward for waste material in Northern Ireland, and indeed the United Kingdom.

I thank you for allowing me to speak, Mr. Cook. I am sorry that I took a little more time than I said I would. I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say.

10.26 am

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): I begin by echoing the concerns of the two hon. Gentleman who have spoken so far. I am sure that the Minister will confirm that it is her full intention that the whole Government should fight for our agriculture industry, particularly with respect to farms in Northern Ireland, where agriculture is obviously more important than in other areas of the United Kingdom.

I should like to speak about green issues. Not a lot of people know this, but my party has nominated me green Minister for Northern Ireland, which is a great honour. [Interruption.] Shadow Minister, that is, I hasten to reassure the Minister.

I want to speak about the national industrial symbiosis programme. The hon. Gentlemen who have spoken mentioned alternative uses for slurry and referred to the lack of investment in anaerobic digestion—both issues are crying out for investment in Northern Ireland. The Government's refusal to allocate funds under NISP, as it is colloquially known, has greatly hampered the farming industry in adapting to change as it needs to do.

I wrote to the Minister about the lack of NISP funding for Northern Ireland. The programme tries to marry different types of industry in a symbiotic way, so that, for example, slurry can be used for different purposes. It allows different parts of industry to work together in new and innovative ways, particularly those that help the environment. When I wrote to the Minister, she responded:

"As part of the Priorities and Budget process, decisions on the allocation of resources have to be taken in the context of local needs and priorities. Therefore, in this instance, it was decided to allocate these resources elsewhere within the Northern Ireland Block where the need is greatest."

Will the Minister say just where that need is greatest, given that we are talking about an industry that is suffering as a result of gold-plated European directives, and that faces all sorts of challenges? How is Northern Ireland agriculture to reshape and reform itself to meet challenges, which are not only industrial but environmental and global, if it is not to receive the support that is being enjoyed by other parts of the United Kingdom?

10.30 am

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) on securing the debate. The subject is of even greater importance to the economy and people of Northern Ireland than it is to the rest of the United Kingdom. I appreciated the wide-ranging nature of his speech. It certainly alerted the House to the complexity of the issues that we are debating and the way that Government policies and European legislation impact on many different types of farm and food businesses in the Province.

There is no doubt that farming, whether in Northern Ireland or elsewhere in this country, is going through a period of rapid and sometimes traumatic change. There is the major reform of the common agricultural policy—a reform that is largely a response to the development of not just a European, but increasingly, a global marketplace for food and food products, with the additional competitive pressures that that brings to bear on our producers. We have, both from the public and the Government, pressure for stricter environmental controls and higher standards of animal welfare. However, at the same time as imposing those higher standards, we as politicians are asking our farmers to compete with producers in parts of the world where such standards of environmental protection and animal welfare do not apply. That is often the case not simply in countries that we might label as developing economies, but in some quite advanced agricultural competitor countries.

It is therefore important for the Government—whoever it is that is in office—to approach regulation in the right way. I recall that about four years ago one of the Select Committees of the House of Lords produced a valuable report on the regulation of agriculture. It suggested a number of ways to change the culture of regulation which would not compromise the need for high standards and the need to root out the rogue elements that exist in farming, as in any industry. At the same time it recognised that, at the end of the day, farmers have to run profitable businesses and we would not get the attractive countryside that we all appreciate—whether we live in villages or cities—were it not for the existence of a thriving agricultural sector. It is important for us all to appreciate that, even in an increasingly urban and suburban society, we do not want our countryside to become simply a museum or an illustration on a chocolate box. We want it to be a vibrant part of the economy and a place where people can make a home and earn a living, as well as an attractive place for city dwellers to visit.

The House of Lords Select Committee concluded that, among other things, there needed to be much earlier consultation with the agricultural sector about regulation, and in particular European regulation, that affected it. In the report, the Committee drew attention to how a number of key European directives—for example, those on the disposal of waste—had got to quite an advanced stage before anyone in Whitehall woke up to the realisation that farmers, as well as more traditional industries, were going to be affected, in some cases quite severely, by that new legislation. Consultation should happen earlier and the Government should firmly resist the gold-plating of European legislation; I agree with everything said by other Members on that subject. However, we also have to recognise and be prepared to say to the electorate that if we are going to rule out gold-plating, that will sometimes mean also saying no to pressures for even higher environmental welfare standards than those provided for in the relevant European legislation. Sometimes, although the gold-plating may be well intended, we in the United Kingdom end up imposing stricter rules on our own businesses than apply elsewhere in the European Union.

My third conclusion from the House of Lords Select Committee report is that a change in the culture of inspection and enforcement in this country is needed. We certainly need fewer different inspectors and inspections, and fewer forms, which too often appear to seek exactly the same information as has been provided on a previous set of forms. We need fewer people coming up the farm track and knocking on the door.

We also need something less tangible, but none the less important. I have lost track of the number of occasions on which farmers—whether in Northern Ireland, my constituency or elsewhere in the country—have contrasted the attitude of inspectors in the United Kingdom with that of inspectors and enforcement officers elsewhere in Europe. The farming organisations' view is that, on the continent, there tends to be a realisation by those charged with enforcing new rules that they have a duty not only to enforce the law, but to discuss with the operator of the relevant farm business how that can be done so as not to compromise the profitability and sustainability of that enterprise.

However, the farming industry here certainly feels that too often the inspector comes in, bangs a wodge of papers on the farmer's desk and says, in effect, "It is up to you to read those and comply with them. If you step out of line, I'll come down on you like a ton of bricks." We need to think our way into some form of co-operation between inspectors and those who are trying to run businesses and serve their customers. That comes through when we consider specific directives.

I shall not repeat everything said by the hon. Member for South Antrim about the nitrates directive; his detailed points about time scales and the 10 m rule on the spreading of manure were valid and well made. I hope that the Minister will say a word about the water framework directive, which will clearly have a massive impact on agriculture throughout Northern Ireland. The fact that in future river quality is to be measured in biological rather than chemical terms marks a very significant change.

It seemed to me from the Select Committee report and other material on that directive that we are still very much in the dark about exactly what standards are to be applied. Yet, from memory, the directive—at least, its initial stages—is supposed to be implemented by 2010.

[Mr. David Lidington]

The changes required to apply the directive will probably mean considerable planning to ensure that businesses can make the adjustments in time. I hope that we will get greater clarity from the Government on that point.

I should also like to express my concern about two aspects of the reform of the CAP. First, I am concerned about the delay in the introduction of the entry-level scheme for Northern Ireland. I had always understood, when the CAP was being negotiated, that the Government regarded the introduction of the entry-level schemes throughout the United Kingdom as integral to their vision of the future of agriculture, and that it was a way to turn farm support payments away from subsidising production and towards providing support for the environmental stewardship carried out by farmers and land managers. Yet I am told by the Ulster Farmers Union that the introduction of the entry-level scheme in the Province is to be delayed for several years. I should like to know why. Is that due to budgetary constraints, or are the Government considering a pilot scheme that might operate with farms in some parts of the Province?

Secondly, I am concerned about cross-compliance, which was touched on in earlier contributions. The industry fears that minor, probably unintentional, lapses could lead to a disproportionate cut in farm payments in a particular year, yet I can recall the repeated assurances from Ministers, while the CAP reforms were being negotiated, that cross-compliance would amount only to what good, well run farms in the United Kingdom were doing already in terms of environmental standards. I hope that we are not seeing what might be described as agricultural mission creep, where environmental standards that one might have expected to fall within the ambit of an entry-level scheme will instead be imposed through the use of cross-compliance. I hope that the Minister can provide some reassurance on that point.

I should like to make two points that particularly affect the cattle industry. First, on the beef export ban and the over-30-months scheme, will the Minister say where we are now on the Commission's expected proposal to lift the export ban on cattle born on or after 1 August 1996? We have been waiting a long time for that. Farmers in Northern Ireland feel especially aggrieved by the delay, because they have not had the curse of BSE that we have had on the mainland of Great Britain and they have seen producers in the Republic of Ireland being able to continue to export their beef and beef products while Northern Ireland's farmers have been constrained.

It is well over a year since the Commission's food and veterinary office published a satisfactory report on the United Kingdom's BSE controls. I should like to know why we are still waiting. Is the delay with the Commission, or is there foot-dragging on the part of other beef producers in the EU? If that is so, will the Minister name and shame those countries?

Secondly, there is a consultation going on about how the new rules on specified material might operate following the hoped-for permission being given for exports. I read with concern in DARD's impact assessment about the possible impact on small rural producers in Northern Ireland and on small abattoirs if the Government did not make use of the derogation to allow the spinal column to be removed at butcher's shops, but instead ruled that it could take place only at certain licensed cutting plants. I very much hope that the Government will listen carefully to the views of the industry—retailers as well as farmers—and of customers who like to eat a piece of mature, grass-reared, well hung beef, and are willing to pay a premium for it in the shops.

Finally, can I press the Minister to say something about bovine tuberculosis? I am sure that, like me, the Minister tuned into "Farming Today" this morning and heard that her colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), is due to make a major announcement on the Government's bovine TB policy tomorrow. I know that the number of reactors in Northern Ireland fell a bit last year compared with the previous year, but I return time and again to the fact that the evidence from the Irish Republic is overwhelming: although the culling of wildlife, and in particular of badgers, is not a panacea, it is effective as part of an overall TB eradication strategy. Northern Ireland's cattle farmers face a crisis. This is a drain year after year on revenues that the Government could well spend on other priorities, and I hope that the Minister will give us some news on that, too.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): I congratulate the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) on securing the debate, and on the reasoned, knowledgeable and passionate way in which he put forward his views. He clearly feels strongly about the subject, and I assure him that my ministerial colleagues and I feel equally strongly about it.

We must ensure that we have a sustainable and efficient agriculture industry in Northern Ireland that is capable of addressing the challenges posed by the rapidly changing society of the 21st century. Contributions to the debate have highlighted many of the current difficulties facing agriculture. If the Northern Ireland industry is to move forward in what is an increasingly competitive environment, it must be fit for purpose and in a position to embrace change and exploit the opportunities that change inevitably brings. Both hon. Members from Northern Ireland made that point.

In the time available to me, I will do my best to address the points that have been raised. With regard to the broad charge that the industry is in decline, the 2005 reduction in the numbers of farmers and farm businesses does not represent evidence of a major exodus from the industry; it is no more than a continuation of existing trends. The rate of decline in the last 12 months is in line with the trend over the past five years—a decrease of about 2 per cent. per annum, as the hon. Member for South Antrim said. Similar patterns of structural adjustment are occurring across Europe. In many cases, the decision to exit the industry coincides with farmer retirement. It is also important to remember that the overall reduction in numbers improves the structure of the sector, and that it will contribute to its future competitiveness and sustainability.

On the age structure of the farm work force, the evidence that we have suggests that the age profile of farmers in Northern Ireland is relatively stable and that it is in line with the average for the EU 15 member states. The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development operates a new entrants scheme, which was launched in June this year. Its aim is to encourage and give support to young entrants who want to build a future in the industry. I can give further information on that.

On the request for a mixture of a lump sum and interest rate subsidy, I have received legal advice and, unfortunately, that is not possible. However, research shows that the interest rate subsidy offers better value for money in respect of encouraging new entrants into the industry and sustaining them. Applicants to the new entrants scheme must have been in business in their own right for no more than one year. We are bound by the legislation on that.

Some Members also referred to the announcement in the draft budget that DARD was proposing to delay the start of the entry-level countryside management scheme in 2008. That has been a cause of concern for a number of stakeholders, including the main farming organisations, which have made representations to my noble Friend Lord Rooker, who has ministerial responsibility for agriculture. I understand that the Department is looking into that again to see if there is anything we can do to bring that forward. An earlier starting date would be of assistance.

The issue of the WTO meeting in Hong Kong was raised. Progress with ongoing WTO negotiations in the development round has been slow, but significant benefits could be delivered to developed and developing countries as a result of an agreement.

The CAP reforms being implemented will help the industry focus on meeting market demands and improving competitiveness. The Department has in place numerous measures to help the industry make the adjustment. They will ultimately put the industry in a position to face the market pressures that are causing difficulties.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) described himself as a walking advert for the Northern Ireland beef industry. I congratulate him on his commitment. The hon. Gentleman, along with the hon. Members for South Antrim and for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), raised a number of issues about beef imports. Hon. Members will be pleased to hear that imports to the UK for the first nine months of 2005 were 18 per cent. below those for the equivalent period in 2004. More than half of the 2005 imports came from the Republic of Ireland, and less than a quarter came from south America, Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina.

The issue of standards was also raised. Beef can be imported to the EU only from countries and establishments that meet strict EU food, veterinary health and hygiene requirements. Full compliance is ensured by inspections carried out at border posts. There is also full traceability under EU-wide beef labelling rules. Looking to the longer term, we must recognise that there is greater competition, and we must address it and help prepare the industry. Rather than trying to stifle trade, we must support the industry to allow it to compete.

All the hon. Members referred to the beef export ban. The recent lifting of the over-30-months rule is a significant step forward. It is a welcome boost for the food industry and for Northern Ireland's beef farmers, who can now enter their older cattle into the food chain. There are three plants that have been approved to slaughter OTM cattle for human consumption. The UK has met all conditions that the Commission set for lifting the ban. Effective BSE controls and traceability systems are in place. BSE has been reduced to achieve moderate risk status and the OTM rule has now ended.

I recognise the concerns that were raised about the matter, and the UK is pressing the Commission for a proposal to be made and adopted to lift the export ban as early as possible in 2006. I understand the concern that any gap between the OTM scheme ending and exports resuming may cause market difficulties. The Commission has made it clear that it is opposed to any extension of the OTM scheme, and there are mechanisms available to consider what action is needed to deal with market difficulties. We are pressing for the lifting of the export ban as soon as possible. It will provide new opportunities for agriculture.

Several hon. Members raised the issue of the nitrates directive and what compliance will mean for the industry locally. The Government are keenly aware of the significance of the issue, and DARD and DOE officials recently met the Commission yet again to discuss outstanding issues about the draft action programme and secure a viable way forward. There have been continual meetings. I remember, in my previous incarnation as a DOE Minister, meeting the industry myself to discuss the matter. The Government have been working with the industry for some time to find ways forward. The process has been protracted and difficult, and there are still differences between us and the Commission over the matter.

The position on a closed period for spreading organic manure has not yet been finalised. However, I can assure hon. Members that phosphorus balance measures at individual farm level will not be required at this stage. That may give some reassurance to the hon. Member for South Antrim, who raised the issue.

The draft action programme will be issued to stakeholders and discussed at their next meeting in January. We are seeking a balance on the issue. We recognise the pressures on farmers, and we shall do all that we can to ensure that we strike a balance between letting the industry get on with the business of farming and recognising the support that we must give to the environment.

If we consider the money that has been made available, we see that significant resources have been allocated to the industry. As part of the revised budget in December 2004, £45 million was announced; that money is still available under those proposals. Moreover, £16.6 million has been allocated for 2006-07 and £28.4 million for 2007-08, so the Government are going a long way to assist farmers in that regard.

The farm nutrient management scheme was also mentioned. Initial uptake has been slower than expected and the closing date has been extended to 31 March 2006. However, commitments totalling £10 million have now been made out of a total Government provision of £45 million, which represents additional support for the industry.

The hon. Member for South Antrim raised concerns about pig farming. I would refute the accusation that we have abandoned that sector or any other. It is always the role of the Department to give support and advice whenever possible within the constraints of EU legislation and within budgetary constraints. Hon. Members will be aware of the pressures on the draft budget. The hon. Members for South Antrim and for Upper Bann have made numerous representations to me about other areas of the budget. Within those constraints, the Department does everything it can to support farmers.

The hon. Member for South Antrim raised the issue of single farm payments being made in Wales and asked if our payments could be as good as those in Wales. I think that ours are even better. We are meeting the targets: of all applicants, 71 per cent. will receive payments totalling £103 million by Christmas and by the end of December that will have risen to 73 per cent. receiving £110 million. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the figure of 80 per cent. in Wales. There is a slight difference in the way that the money is counted; it is not the case that less money is being paid out in Northern Ireland. From a slow start, that represents very good progress, given that the applications were made in May and so much money is being paid by the end of the year.

Renewables and the environment were mentioned. It is worth flagging up that in the draft budget announced today there will be £50 million for an environment and energy fund, which will allow us to look for new opportunities to bring Northern Ireland to the fore in the field of renewables. As an energy Minister, I have a particular interest in that.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann mentioned anaerobic digestion. DARD has carried out extensive research and development in this area. It has offered financial assistance of about £3 million to a centralised anaerobic digestion plant; that particular project faced local opposition. However, part of the new strategy is the work of an expert group on animal waste, and research and development in the Department will help us learn what else can be done. We shall consider the opportunities that can be made available.

On university provision, I assure the hon. Member for South Antrim that we are working to ensure that there is in Northern Ireland a degree-level qualification in agricultural technology. There is extensive provision already in the sector, of which we should be proud.

The power of supermarkets was mentioned. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government are working closely with supermarkets on local sourcing; I know that he has asked a parliamentary question about that recently and has further information. I understand the concerns raised about the increasing concentration and buying power of supermarkets. I am concerned about allegations that multiple retailers are making excess profits at the expense of producers. If there is specific evidence of that, I ask hon. Members to give it to the Office of Fair Trading, and action should be taken.

The hon. Member for Aylesbury raised the issue of badgers and TB. He will be aware that the badger stakeholder group is considering the matter at the moment, and the results of the work will be presented to the badger group at a further meeting. It is expected to report to Lord Rooker in early 2006. I recognise the strongly held views on both sides of that argument. We felt that research and investigation was the appropriate way forward.

I hope that I have addressed as many of the points raised during the debate as possible. The breadth of issues raised shows the scale of interest in this subject in Northern Ireland and the challenges faced by the industry. There are numerous difficulties; I assure hon. Members that the Department will work closely with farmers and those in the industry to do all that we can to support them because that is important to the future well-being of the industry and the economy of Northern Ireland.

Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency

11 am

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to have a short debate on what has become an important matter. After I applied for this Adjournment debate, The Mail on Sunday exposed the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency for selling the names and addresses of many tens of thousands of motorists, and since then the issue has moved up the political agenda considerably.

From my point of view, the issue arose in a small way when Tesco opened a new store on the edge of Hexham, the main town in my constituency, which was recently voted the best market town in the UK. Leaving that aside, Tesco has a large car park in the centre of the town, adjacent to the council car park where charges are made, and in order to protect its car park it introduced a parking control system. Much to our surprise, little yellow signs went up around the car park with an illustration of a camera on them, saying that if people overstayed their welcome in the car park, which was three hours, their registration numbers would be photographed and the company would apply to the DVLA for their names and addresses and they would then be asked to pay a charge of £70, which would be given to charity.

That caused a certain amount of outrage in the community as most of us felt that this was an abuse of the powers of the DVLA. We were amazed that a company such as Tesco—or probably its parking contractor—was able to obtain names and addresses in this way. As a consequence of that and a certain amount of local publicity, I wrote to the Minister, who replied courteously and quickly, in rather unconcerned terms. He wrote to me on 10 November explaining that under regulation 27 of the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations 2002, the DVLA was free to give the names and addresses of car owners to anyone who could demonstrate a reasonable cause for their request. He pointed out:

> "'Reasonable cause' is not defined in law but release is normally associated with road safety, the direct involvement of a vehicle in road traffic incidents, the enforcement of road traffic legislation and the collection of taxes."

He added—this is important—

> "Requests from private car park enforcement companies meet the 'reasonable cause' criteria. Landlords would have great difficulty in enforcing their rights to their property if this was not the case."

That would seem to most people to be a reasonable definition of circumstances in which the DVLA should give out names and addresses, but from that it never crossed our minds that this provision would be used in wholesale fashion by large supermarket companies and others.

Finally, in his letter, the Minister directed us to the website of the Information Commissioner, www.informationcommissioner.gov.uk, saying that the Information Commissioner was aware of the arrangements for private car park enforcement and had issued advice on the website.

That was fine until 27 November when The Mail on Sunday published details of a large-scale investigation, which revealed the enormous scale of the releasing of information by the DVLA. The paper identified 157 different organisations that had computer access to the DVLA records and were able to obtain names and addresses of drivers for a whole variety of reasons. Among them was a company called Euro Parking Collection, which collects parking tickets incurred by British motorists abroad. They get in touch with the DVLA here and then the fines are issued in order to be repatriated to the country of origin.

Among those other organisations that were revealed as having rights of access to the information were not just car park owners, but car park clampers as well. Many of us will know the circumstances under which many of these car park clampers operate, and it is fair to say that they work very close to the edge of the law. Indeed, some of those identified as having the right of access to the DVLA records have criminal convictions for illegal clamping and what is effectively blackmail. Others with the right of access are bailiffs, credit control companies, debt collection agencies, property management firms, leisure centres, solicitors and even MBNA—which is, as The Mail of Sunday put it, one of the world's largest loan and financial services companies. When MBNA was asked, it said that it wanted it to protect the private car park at its Chester offices.

We must ask ourselves what use these companies can make of that information. I am making no allegations against MBNA, or Tesco, or anyone, but it is a fact that people's details are extremely valuable in marketing terms. Lists of people and their interests change hands for money, because companies want to build up a database. We would all be quite surprised at the amount of information that the large supermarkets have about us. They know what we buy; they can probably tell us how many bedrooms there are in our houses and how many people live there by the number of toilet rolls that we consume. They know all about us, and it might be of interest to them and others to know who actually owns a car—whether it is ours or a company's—or what the value of that car is. That such information is getting out is a serious matter.

There are other people who would be interested in knowing who owns which particular vehicle—car thieves for one, and motorbike thieves for another. There are some expensive Italian motorbikes on the roads that are worth large sums of money and so are a target for thieves. If somebody is seen riding a Ducati, for example, their registration number could be taken and all that would then be needed would be a contact with direct access to the DVLA database, such as a mate at one of these car clamping companies, who could tell them who owned it and where they lived and it could then be easily stolen.

Other people are also intrigued by car registration numbers. There are those on the fringes of the newspaper world who keep an eye on what celebrities and others are up to. There are strange creatures who occasionally rummage through the dustbins of celebrities to find out what is there and who has written to them. Others wish to know who is visiting, and it is rather useful, when a particular celebrity is visited regularly by someone in a particular car, to be able to find out to whom that car belongs. Quite a lot of money could be made from a newspaper by revealing such a relationship. So there are people with ill intent who would wish to get hold of such information.

[Mr. Peter Atkinson]

In another life, before I came to this place, I seem to recall that, over the years, a number of police officers were prosecuted for making improper use of DVLA records. To be precise, police officers would be asked by their various contacts—who may have been journalists, bailiffs, debt collectors or others—whether they could find out who owned a particular car and where it might be found. They may have wanted to repossess it. For a certain small sum, the officers would be prepared to do that. A number were discovered doing that, dismissed from the force and punished in court.

The sanctity, we may say, of the DVLA list changed in 2002 when, under the negative resolution procedure, a statutory instrument was put through the House allowing all this to happen. It is fair to say that it is a failing of the House that so much legislation goes through in that way. How on earth can Members of Parliament spot something like this? I obtained a copy of the statutory instrument, which, on the face of it, seems perfectly reasonable. As I said, it refers to reasonable cause. There was no suggestion that this would be used wholesale, to give out millions and millions of drivers' details in that way.

The ease with which one can access the system is also alarming. To set up a direct computer link to the DVLA one has to pay about £3,000, and then it is simply a question of banging in the number and getting back the information, for which one is billed £2.50. The DVLA has made several million pounds from the system since it started in 2002. Curiously, it is the only department that allows such information to be sold. No other departments do; they hold it close to their chests. Interestingly, when the story broke, the Information Commissioner and others appear to have taken the view that this was quite wrong.

The Department for Constitutional Affairs, which is responsible for the Information Commissioner and the Data Protection Act 1998, said that the practice was unacceptable. That is one Department talking to another Department, saying that the practice of an agency related to the Department for Transport is unacceptable. When tackled about this, the assistant Information Commissioner, Mr. Bamford, was also critical. He was quoted as saying:

"We will be taking this up with the DVLA to find out why they think this is covered by the 'reasonable cause' provision."

He, too, believes that the reasonable cause provision is being grossly exaggerated and extended by the present system.

My constituents were scandalised when they saw what was going on at Tesco. They became even more incensed when they read in The Mail on Sunday and in other papers about the scale of what was happening. Most reasonable people would think that it was unacceptable. I am pleased that, following the publication of the article in The Mail on Sunday, the Minister began to take a more robust approach. I believe that he said that he was going to take a more robust view and examine the matter with a view to having a consultation about what could be done. No doubt he will have time to explain that.

This is not a question of consultation. It is a serious matter that requires urgent action. The original statutory instrument must clearly have been based on some piece of enacted legislation in the House, so I presume it is relatively simple to introduce another statutory instrument to put a stop to this. The Minister must put a stop to it. It is a gross intrusion into people's privacy. It is Big Brother coming to the DVLA. We are giving out private names and addresses, which could put people at risk, in order for the DVLA to make £2.50 a time and a few million pounds over the years. It is a scandal and it should stop.

11.12 am

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) on taking an interest in this matter and on obtaining this Adjournment debate. I will start with his final comment—the implication that the DVLA does this in order to make millions of pounds. In actual fact, it makes not one penny on these dealings. It is allowed to charge a small fee to cover its administrative costs only; it is not allowed to make a profit. If it is reasonable that information is given out in some circumstances—I will deal with that in a moment—surely it is right that the cost of meeting that reasonable demand does not fall on the taxpayer. Therefore, those people who will benefit from it should pay a sufficient sum to cover the costs. That is exactly what they do. No profit is involved for the DVLA: £2.50 is a small fee, which is chosen to be just sufficient to cover the administrative costs of providing the information.

After all, as the hon. Gentleman said, many of the people who are requesting the information are doing so for the purpose of running a business that makes a profit. Possibly, they are in the business of enforcing private parking arrangements. They make a profit out of doing that and it is right therefore that they should pay something for the information that they need in order to do so. It is right that the costs should not fall on the taxpayer, and therefore a small fee is paid. Let us deal with that issue first and foremost. The DVLA makes no profit out of this. There is no money-making exercise on behalf of the DVLA or on behalf of Government. Sufficient money is raised to cover only the legitimate costs involved in this transaction.

Before I deal with the next issue, I will put it on the record, loudly and clearly, that I have undertaken to carry out a review of the policy. I believe that certain of the allegations that were made in The Mail on Sunday have raised legitimate concerns that need to be addressed. As yet, I am not taking a position on them one way or the other, but issues have been raised and the public are entitled to understand that they have been thoroughly examined and that we have arrived at a proper position. We will carry out a thorough review covering all aspects of the arrangement, and we will begin with the consultation. We need a consultation to deal with the core issue, which is about what is reasonable. When is it reasonable for the DVLA to provide such information?

The hon. Gentleman started by mentioning the case of his local Tesco, which has a piece of private land. I am surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman, who is a Conservative after all, seeming to imply that anybody should be allowed to park on that piece of land for as long as they want, irrespective of whether they are engaged in commerce with Tesco. He shakes his head, but either Tesco is allowed to enforce parking restrictions on its private land or it is not.

Mr. Atkinson rose—

Dr. Ladyman: Let me make this point, then I shall certainly allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene. If we decide that Tesco should be allowed to enforce parking restrictions on that land, the question is how it is to do that. First, the company not unreasonably put up a sign explaining how it would enforce its parking restrictions, so that people knew how long they were welcome to park for free. Secondly, it indicated what it would do if a person decided to exceed the time limit, so that people knew. Thirdly, it explained how it would go about enforcing the restrictions and at what cost.

It sounded to me as though anyone parking there would know exactly the circumstances of the transaction. What would be the alternatives for Tesco? One, which I should like the hon. Gentleman to address when he intervenes, is that it would be forced to clamp vehicles. That is one of my big concerns. If in our consultation we come to the conclusion that private car parking companies should not have access to the DVLA database to enforce private parking, many businesses will have no alternative but to use clamping companies to enforce their parking rules. Tesco would have to clamp the hon. Gentleman's constituents' cars after three hours and charge a fee before it released them. If he thinks that his constituents would be happier about that than the arrangement that Tesco currently uses, I suspect that he does not know his constituents very well. I think that they would be horrified.

Mr. Atkinson: I am sorry, but the Minister has not grasped the tenet of this issue; this is a question of principle versus practicality. However, I leave that aside. Of course I understand that Tesco is perfectly entitled to police its car park in whatever way it decides, but there are many ways of doing that other than clamping. If the Minister goes supermarket shopping in many parts of the country, he will find different systems. One system uses a barrier: the person goes in, takes a ticket and has it endorsed at the till, which allows them out free of charge. If the person overstays their time, they are made to pay by an attendant at the barrier. Many other systems can be used without giving a private parking contractor access to DVLA records. That is a matter of principle, not practicality.

Dr. Ladyman: I understand the hon. Gentleman when he describes the matter as one of principle rather than practicality, but he describes exactly what I would regard as a case of practicality. In this particular case, Tesco seems to have concluded, rightly or wrongly, that it would rather have a relatively cheap method of enforcement that does not require barriers or people sitting at the gates collecting money after three hours. It would rather have a system that is, or ought to be, more or less self-enforcing—and therefore free—so as not to have to pass the costs on to its customers. The hon. Gentleman's constituents presumably pay less in that Tesco store than they would in other supermarkets that use manned barriers and other methods for collecting money. That is the commercial decision that Tesco has made.

Let us deal with the principle of whether the information should be available. Let us go through one or two scenarios in which we might make it available. If I were to drive into the hon. Gentleman's motor vehicle in the House of Commons car park, leave a dent in it and drive off without telling anybody about it and somebody were quick enough to spot me doing it and take my number, would he not think it reasonable for him to be able to approach the DVLA, get my details and make me pay the bill?

Mr. Atkinson: No.

Dr. Ladyman: I think that that would be reasonable. If the hon. Gentleman thinks it reasonable—I suspect that most of our constituents would do—the principle is established: there are circumstances in which it is reasonable for the DVLA to provide that information. If he does not think that it is reasonable for a private individual to be able to do that, it is up to him to say how private individuals will enforce their rights when somebody parks on their private property, or dents their motor vehicle and drives away after their number has been taken.

Having said that, I also entirely accept that there are circumstances in which it would not be reasonable for that to happen. The hon. Gentleman described many circumstances in which I would unequivocally say that it would not be reasonable. It is not reasonable for the paparazzi to attempt to trace celebrities by getting information from their number plates from the DVLA. If we find in our review that they are able to do that, I promise the hon. Gentleman that it will be stopped. As he said, it is also not reasonable for information to be provided to people who might be car or motorcycle thieves, and if I find that there are loopholes in the arrangements through which such information can be obtained by such people, we will try to find a way to stop that.

In order to achieve what we want, more is needed than just for me to make an edict. We need to have a consultation about what is reasonable and what is not reasonable. If we decide that there are circumstances in which access is reasonable, we will need to have a discussion about how thoroughly we would expect the DVLA to check that reasonable cause has been established. Current road traffic legislation makes it clear that the DVLA has a duty to provide such information to people who have reasonable cause. That is the basis on which the DVLA is providing that information. However, as I stated in my letter to the hon. Gentleman, reasonable cause is not established in law. Perhaps one of the things that will emerge out of this consultation is that we need to have greater clarity about what is, and what is not, reasonable cause. I will keep an open mind during the review, but my opinion at present is that there are circumstances in which it is perfectly right and justified that the DVLA should be required to make that information available.

I do not want there to be a proliferation of clamping companies throughout the country. My constituents would not welcome having even more clampers out on the streets, but that will be the consequence if we take away the right of people legitimately to police private car parking by this method. People will have no alternative but to enforce parking in private car parks and on private land through clamping. We do not want to encourage that.

I believe that most people think that there are circumstances in which insurance companies and others should have access to the information. However, it would certainly not be right if the information could be obtained and used for marketing purposes. I am not a lawyer, but my understanding of the Data Protection Act is that if one obtains personal information about somebody, it can be used only for the purpose for which it was obtained, it can be stored and processed only in accordance with the purpose for which it was obtained, and the data protection registrar would expect the computer database that holds that information to be managed in accordance with that purpose.

Therefore, if Tesco were to put up a sign in the hon. Gentleman's constituency that said, "If you park for more than three hours, we will take a picture of your car number plate and use the information we get from that to enforce a charge against you," that is the only purpose for which that information could be used. However, if Tesco were to put up a camera in its car park in order to record its customers entering in their cars to obtain personal information about them, I doubt very much that that would be legal, and it would certainly not be legal with the type of notification that the hon. Gentleman has described as being displayed in that car park. In any case, I doubt very much that Tesco would contemplate doing that sort of thing.

Mr. Atkinson: I agree.

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Gentleman nods his head; he does not think that Tesco are using it in order to get that sort of information.

A debate needs to be had on this matter. We have to decide what is and what is not a reasonable cause. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is going to be absolutist about this matter and say that there is no reasonable cause. If he said that the only two groups of people who should have access to the information on the DVLA database are the DVLA for the purpose of collecting vehicle excise duty and the police for the purpose of criminal investigations, and if that was the general view, we would need to change the law to reflect that.

However, we must consider what the consequences would be. It would be difficult to enforce private parking, there would be cost increases for people engaged in certain transactions because the cost of the transactions would increase, and there would be no recourse for individuals who cannot get the help of an insurance company or the police to track someone who is responsible for damage to their vehicle. We have to accept that those would be the consequences of taking the absolutist view.

If we decide that the absolutist view is not the correct one, and that in some circumstances reasonable cause can be established, we must ensure that reasonable cause is being established. The hon. Gentleman painted a picture of completely unauthorised individuals getting automatic access to the DVLA database, not providing details of the incident about which they are requesting information and not establishing reasonable cause. That is not my understanding of how the system works.

At present, individuals who want information about somebody must provide information about themselves and about the incident. They must fill in a comprehensive form to establish why they need the information. Organisations that wish to engage in a high volume of such transactions must first establish their bona fides. They must provide details of their business, including when it was established, on headed letter paper. There is a sift to ensure that there is reasonable cause, and they must give the time and date of the incident in respect of which they are requesting information each time they apply for information.

We may decide in the course of the review that things need to be tightened up. Perhaps a more thorough investigation of these matters must be carried out before we allow such access to the database. Perhaps we need to sift more information before we provide information on individual cases, in which case the cost would increase. Why should the taxpayer pay for this? I am not suggesting that the DVLA will want to make a profit in the future any more than it has in the past, but we would have to increase the cost if we took that approach.

Another possibility that should be considered in the review is one that I confess I found out about by accident, while reading a thriller on the train the other day. In some states in America, if an individual requests information about the owner of a vehicle on the basis of a registration number, the information is provided if reasonable cause is established, but the owner of the vehicle is contacted and told that that information has been provided, why it was provided and to whom it was provided. Both the owner of the vehicle and the person requesting the information know that a request has been made for information. I would like the review to consider whether that should be built into the system as an additional protection.

I promise the hon. Gentleman that the views that he has expressed today and any other views that he wishes to present will be included in the consultation, which will be thorough. We will start on it as soon as possible by producing a consultation document. We need to focus on what is reasonable cause and whether it can be established. If we decide that it can sometimes be established, we need to focus on whether we are checking thoroughly enough to ensure that the sort of abuses that he identified do not happen. Then we must consider the consequences of any change, including the cost to the taxpayer and customers, and any unintended consequences. As I have said on several occasions, we certainly do not want to encourage the growth of clamping. I doubt that our constituents would thank us for that.

The review will be thorough. The views of the hon. Gentleman, his constituents and The Mail on Sunday will be taken into account. I encourage anybody who has evidence that the system is being abused to provide me with it so that we can get to the bottom of matter.

UK World Heritage Sites

2.30 pm

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): Thank you for calling me to speak, Mr. Olner. It is a pleasure to be in your company this afternoon, as it always is. It is appropriate that we are having a debate on UK world heritage sites, because we are sitting—and I am standing—in a world heritage site now. About a week and a half ago, I was lucky enough to be re-elected as chairman of the all-party world heritage sites group—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] I knew that I would get an accolade in this House for something. It is a great pleasure to serve in that position.

A number of Members in the Chamber have been active in the all-party group for some years. I see the hon. Members for East Devon (Mr. Swire), for Salisbury (Robert Key), for Shipley (Philip Davies) and for Bath (Mr. Foster) and my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz). I am sure that other colleagues will be keen to join in the work of the all-party group in time, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar), who I know hopes to catch your eye a little later, Mr. Olner.

The all-party world heritage sites group has been functioning for several years. The group is cross-party, as is the nature of this debate. We want to get our teeth into world heritage issues, put the politics to one side and talk about how we can ensure that world heritage sites deliver the very best for us as a nation and for the communities in which they sit. I hope that the tone of this debate will be one of constructive thought and the desire to make sure that new partnerships develop so that our world heritage sites are protected for the future.

I should like to thank English Heritage, which has taken on the role of the all-party group's secretariat support. I particularly wanted to thank Peter Just, who is not a million miles away at this very moment, for the work that he is already doing for the group. The group welcomes English Heritage's support.

Today almost seems like world heritage day: this morning, the Minister and I had the pleasure of attending the annual general meeting of the Local Authority World Heritage Forum, which brings together all local authority areas with world heritage sites to ensure a co-ordinated view of the needs, desires and aspirations of world heritage sites across local government. The forum works in partnership with a range of organisations that I shall probably mention this afternoon.

I want to split my speech into two sections. I want to talk about some of the broader issues affecting world heritage sites in the UK, but obviously, Mr. Olner, you would not blame me for wanting to speak briefly about the world heritage site in my own constituency—the Ironbridge gorge—and I shall do that in my closing remarks.

The 1972 UNESCO world heritage convention was perhaps the most successful of all; it covered 180 member states and more than 800 world heritage sites. By joining the convention, member states undertake to protect their heritage, both natural and cultural, in general terms. They also have the opportunity to identify places of outstanding value to all humanity, and they can nominate them to be included on the UNESCO world heritage list. Once sites are on that, member states accept that the international community will take an interest in the management of those places through the work of the world heritage committee.

Within the UK, world heritage is probably the best known aspect of UNESCO's work, and the one that captures the popular imagination, because it is linked to specific places. World heritage involves many players. At national level, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport has the lead responsibility for the convention, and other Departments, such as the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, are also involved.

The devolved Administrations are involved too, as are the newly re-established UK National Commission for UNESCO and non-governmental organisations such as the UK committee of the International Council on Monuments and Sites, ICOMOS-UK. Of course, the Local Authority World Heritage Forum is also involved, as are individual local authorities and organisations that are present within world heritage sites.

There is a wide range of partners within world heritage sites. For example, one of the key players in my area is the Ironbridge Gorge museums trust. Such organisations take an important leading role within the world heritage site in their locality.

The UK joined the world heritage convention in 1984 and now has 26 world heritage sites: 16 in England, four in Scotland, two in Wales, one in Northern Ireland and three in overseas territories—I am sure that the Minister will be particularly keen to visit those.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. David Lammy) indicated assent.

David Wright: I would like to go there as well, if the Minister will take me with him.

Twenty-one UK world heritage sites are cultural sites, four are natural sites and one, St. Kilda, is both a cultural and a natural site. During its 21 years in the convention, the UK has gone through three distinct phases of site development. During the first phase, from 1984 to about 1989, we nominated obvious monumental iconic sites in the UK—for example, Stonehenge, Avebury and the Tower of London—without much thought to the consequences for managing such places in the future.

During the second phase, from 1989 to 1997, we realised after a series of planning appeals that world heritage status was a significant factor in the management and sustainable use of places such as Avebury, Ironbridge and Hadrian's wall. We started to consider other places, as well as the obvious monumental iconic sites, and that led in 1994 to planning policy guidance note 15, which stated that world heritage sites were a key material consideration in planning cases. It asked local authorities to develop policies to protect them and recommended that they draw up management plans as well.

[David Wright]

Management plans are now a key feature of the UK's approach to world heritage sites. Their implementation is overseen by steering groups of stakeholders, including national agencies, local authorities, site owners and local communities. Since 1997, the number of UK world heritage sites has increased from 16 to 26. I understand that all but four have current management plans, and work should be completed on the remaining few sites—the last four—during 2006.

Management plans are incredibly important, as most world heritage sites are living communities. People live in them, and local people need to understand how the organisations involved in managing the site will interact with them. They need to know how they can make plans to change their housing, to start up a new business or to do something else within the site. They need to think about how their plans will correspond with the management plan for the site. The management plans are important documents, and credit is due to all the organisations that have moved so quickly to ensure that they are in place.

The third phase of development involved a review of tentative sites for world heritage status, which must be considered collectively on their merits. Between 1997 and 1999, the review of the tentative list marked a new approach to defining world heritage sites in the UK. In large part, the tentative list moves the balance from monuments, which can be managed, to urban and rural landscapes, which are far more difficult to manage. Management plans would be crucial if further sites were to be designated. We must consider the sustainability of such sites for the benefit of local and national communities.

That has been a quick canter through some of the broad themes in world heritage. The Minister may like to reflect on some of the key issues when he speaks, and I am sure that other colleagues will do the same. I shall now raise five points.

The first issue is the statutory recognition of world heritage. Historically, there has been no statutory protection in the UK for world heritage sites, unlike listed buildings, conservation areas, ancient monuments, national parks and so on. The current review of heritage designations and protection is an opportunity to address that. World heritage sites sit at the top of the heritage hierarchy. The designation is one of the few of international significance that we recognise in the UK, and the statutory recognition and protections afforded to such sites should reflect the importance of world heritage sites in that heritage hierarchy.

I understand that the DCMS has announced that the new heritage register will include world heritage sites. I should like the Minister to say a few words about that, because if that is the case, it is a major step forward. It would be interesting to hear his views on how the interaction with local authorities and their planning powers is working, and its impact on how we treat our world heritage sites in the UK.

The second theme is about the resourcing and management of world heritage sites. The primary responsibility for world heritage sites in the UK rests with the Government, because of their deal with UNESCO, but much of the day-to-day management falls on the local authorities where the sites are located. They have individual and day-to-day responsibility for protecting, promoting and presenting sites that fall within their boundaries.

Local funding for those activities varies between sites, but in practice there is pressure on local authority budgets. Authorities and communities benefit from the generation of tourism that the sites engender, but because of the national and international status of the sites and the scale of visitor numbers, they put unique pressures and burdens on local areas. Will the Minister open up a continuing dialogue with colleagues at the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to consider the impact that world heritage sites have on local authorities, and whether we can do any more to assist them?

Thirdly, I want to reflect on the promotion of world heritage. The brand and the concept are probably not that well known beyond anoraks like us. Most people probably realise that there are one or two world heritage sites locally, regionally or nationally, but we do not promote the brand well in the UK, never mind internationally. We must do more to ensure that world heritage and the world heritage sites are considered key destinations for people who want to visit the UK, and for internal tourism. That is important.

I was lucky enough last year to visit the grand canyon. It is a world heritage site in the United States, but there was no indication of that status. It is clearly of world significance, but it would have been nice to have walked into the entrance lobby of the main hotel on the rim of the grand canyon to find a brochure on worldwide world heritage sites, showing Bath, Stonehenge, Ironbridge gorge and other sites in the UK and throughout the world, where people could pick up and follow the world heritage trail.

We must consider that idea. It is particularly important because the Olympic games will take place in this country in 2012. Would it not be a shame if millions of visitors came to London and other sites throughout the country, including world heritage sites that will host parts of the Olympics, but never got any further? Would it not be nice to get some of those millions of visitors out of the Olympic venues, London and the other locations where events are being held, and into world heritage sites?

What better way is there of promoting Britain and its contribution to the world through the Olympics than by promoting Britain's own world heritage sites? There is an opportunity, and I hope that the Minister will ensure that we seize it.

We in Telford had the pleasure of receiving the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell) recently. He was keen to work with our hon. Friend the Minister who is here today to promote world heritage sites as tourist destinations in association with the Olympic games.

Fourthly, several world heritage sites throughout the UK are at specific risk from development and from natural problems such as flooding, land instability or coastal erosion. The status and the physical fabric of several sites are under threat. We need help and support from across the Government to ensure that those sites are protected. Many local authorities cannot carry the burden of ensuring that their site is protected. We need support from central Government.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend is making an interesting contribution. As he will know, the world heritage site in my constituency is a living, urban heritage site, with several thousand people living in it. One of the issues that we face is how to maintain a vibrant urban centre when there are pressures from many directions, such as the pressures on small shops and smaller shopping centres, and the effects of that pressure. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important to consider how urban heritage sites are affected by wider trends in the retail and shopping markets and in planning policy? To put it bluntly, the viability of the heritage site in my constituency would be affected if the local community were to run down because of pressures on the local shopping and retail centres; that would undermine the entire living nature of that heritage site.

David Wright: My hon. Friend makes his point very well. It is important to bear in mind what we might term global factors, such as changing retail markets, in thinking about management plans for world heritage sites.

In world heritage site management, it is important that we do not stop the development, change and evolution of sites in urban environments, such as my hon. Friend's and mine. We do not want to preserve them totally; we want to ensure that their key elements are preserved, and their key spirit, but we should not turn down all development or stop all retail growth or change. We should respond in a way that is in keeping with the spirit of the management plan and the spirit of world heritage. Many urban world heritage sites are not static communities; they are living communities where people want to go shopping and earn a living—where people live. It is important that we understand that in our management of world heritage sites.

I am conscious that several Members want to speak, but I wish to make a fifth and final point; it is about specific development threats, and it fits in particularly well with my hon. Friend's comment. In planning world heritage site environments in both rural and urban areas, it is important that we consider the scale, scope, quality and design of new buildings. I understand that Cologne in Germany was put on the world heritage at risk register in 2004 because of approvals given for high buildings outside the buffer zone, more than 1 km from the cathedral, which is inscribed. I would hate similar situations to arise, where buildings are developed around world heritage sites that detract from those sites. We must manage planning processes extremely carefully.

Mark Lazarowicz: On that point, may I offer an example? One of the issues in the world heritage site of Edinburgh new town in my constituency is the need for affordable housing. Affordable housing that meets the high standards—it is correct that they should be so—in that site tends to cost a lot more than affordable housing in other parts of the community. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is therefore important that local, devolved and central Government should be prepared to pay extra to ensure that where there are vibrant communities, we can have affordable housing for a range of people? If that costs more because the housing has to meet the higher standards required for world heritage sites, so be it, because that cost has to be met.

David Wright: As Parliamentary Private Secretary to a Minister in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, I must be careful about what I say; I notice that my hon. Friend the Minister is looking at me with that thought in mind. However, I agree that it is important to promote high-quality design in development. I worked in the housing sector for 13 years, and I think that it is possible to secure very high-quality buildings that are fit for purpose through existing regimes, by acting creatively and addressing quality—and, occasionally perhaps, by pushing at the cost boundaries.

Perhaps we should not mention the Scottish Parliament building in this context, but to ensure that we get quality, we should look very closely at planning applications within world heritage site areas. We need to ensure that partners who wish to work in those areas are aware of their responsibilities within the management plan.

Time is pressing on, Mr. Olner, but I want to make two brief concluding remarks about Ironbridge. The first is on a positive note, while the second is about a local problem with which I hope the Minister might be able to help us.

First, Ironbridge gorge, within my constituency, has a major and regular flooding problem, which goes beyond Ironbridge, down through Coalbrookdale to Coalport. Recently, in February 2004 and November 2005, we instituted a successful scheme that defended the Wharfage by placing pallet barriers along it. We were grateful to ministers at DEFRA for working with ourselves and the local community to ensure that we had flood protection on the Wharfage at Ironbridge. But there are still properties where we have problems, so it would help if the Minister could meet council officials and myself to discuss continuing problems with flooding in the world heritage site area.

Secondly, as local people will be aware, there is a major problem with land instability within the gorge. A combination of geology, erosion, mineral exploitation and ongoing development within the gorge has caused a series of land instability problems. The bill for remedying that is significant. The initial scheme, which we have at the moment, to stabilise one of the areas at greatest risk, will cost £5.2 million. That will be funded by the European regional development fund and specific awards through the local transport plan. But we need to look at a much larger scheme—for which we would need Government support—if we are to ensure that we deal with that land instability problem, and avoid ongoing problems with our world heritage site resulting from the natural environment.

I will conclude there, having tried to canter round the broad issues relating to world heritage—some of the challenges and problems that we face, but also some opportunities. We have a massive asset here which, if we are careful, will ensure that we bring in a large number of tourists to the UK and promote tourism across it. World heritage sites can be an engine for their local economy. We have certainly found that with Ironbridge, and I know that other hon. Members find the same with the world heritage sites in their areas. I am proud to chair the all-party group, and I look forward to a continuing dialogue with the DCMS and other departments on the issues that I have raised.

[David Wright]

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Several Members have said that they want to speak, so let me tell the spokesmen from the Liberal Democrat and Conservative parties that I intend to give the Minister at least 15 minutes to wind up.

2.53 pm

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): It gives me great pleasure to congratulate the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright), first on securing the debate and secondly on his renewed chairmanship of the all-party group. He is doing a service to us all, and to world heritage sites. I wonder, Mr. Olner, whether you remember the film that accompanied the British bid for the Olympic games in Singapore, and the dramatic effect of seeing Stonehenge with the Olympic flags behind it. That was part of the reason why Britain gained the Olympic games for London. Of course, I have the honour to represent the stones and the Stonehenge world heritage site, which includes Avebury, which is not actually in my constituency.

The story of Stonehenge is a great one, but also a sad one. Back in 1985 the United Kingdom withdrew from UNESCO. I was, at the time, the last national commissioner to have been appointed for UNESCO from the United Kingdom. I was obviously sad at the decision of my Government to pull out at that time. However, that has been remedied. We are back in, and I am delighted that the Secretary of State for International Development took that decision.

During the period that we were out, much had happened in terms of designating British sites. There is now a long and distinguished list, as we know. UNESCO now has a full British complement and is responsible for the world heritage sites. Sue Davies is chairman of the culture committee of the UK National Commission for UNESCO and the chief executive of Wessex Archaeology. I should, therefore, start by declaring a non-pecuniary interest as a director and trustee of Wessex Archaeology.

I remember well the launch of English Heritage in the chapter-house of Westminster Abbey, just across the road. In those days the chapter-house belonged to the Government and was administered by the Department of the Environment, and then by English Heritage. At the first meeting of English Heritage, Lord Montagu of Beaulieu pledged that the No. 1 priority would be Stonehenge, including the refurbishment of the visitor centre, improvement of the site and taking the roads out of the landscape.

Lord Montagu made huge strides and efforts over many years, but he did not quite get there. He was not the only one who was defeated. Margaret Thatcher was defeated, too. I recall visiting her as Prime Minister in her rooms in the House of Commons. She got on her hands and knees with me, poring over the maps, looking at the Stonehenge issue and arguing the case, because that was the sort of person she was. However, even she did not manage to crack the problem of Stonehenge.

Then Sir Jocelyn Stevens came on the scene and he, as chairman of English Heritage, brought to bear all his charm and charisma and all the other traits for which he was famous and made valiant, dramatic attempts to solve the problems of Stonehenge. We recall the cartoons of people at English Heritage jumping out of windows and all those happy days. However, even Sir Jocelyn did not solve the problem of Stonehenge. I hope that Sir Neil Cossons will solve the problem; he is the person most likely to succeed.

It was not just Margaret Thatcher who failed to succeed; our present Prime Minister also failed. I raised the matter of Stonehenge with him at Prime Minister's questions in July 1997, when he said that the Government were aware of the problem and would do their best to try to solve it. We are still waiting. I suspect that the Prime Minister will have retired before the stones are put in their proper context.

This is an extraordinary story about a world heritage site, because everyone has wanted to succeed. I know, because I was the first Minister for National Heritage at the Department of National Heritage. Quite rightly, Sir Humphrey said, "No, Minister. You can't get involved in your own constituency." So that was fine. But then I became the Minister for Roads and Traffic and I saw the problem from another angle and, once again, Sir Humphrey rightly said, "No, Minister. You can't get involved in your own constituency." So I could not solve the problem either.

The local authorities were hugely enthusiastic about cracking the problem. Local government officers in Wiltshire county council and Salisbury district council were sweating away, trying hard to find the right way through. That was a great drain on their expertise and on the local authority budgets, but nobody succeeded.

The current Minister has a huge challenge before him. I know that he understands what this is all about, because he is helpful and courteous, and has been infinitely patient as he has observed the sand slipping through his fingers when it comes to Stonehenge. His door has always been open; I am grateful for that. I know that, thanks to his background, he has a good feeling for the importance of things like world heritage sites in our national history.

Stonehenge is about more than that, however; it is a matter of national and international significance. I was going through one of the huge piles of Government brochures, plans and so on, and I came across a brilliant initial plan that was produced to celebrate the English Heritage bids, which spoke of "Working together to meet the challenge."

And on the front of that Stonehenge master plan was a quote from Siegfried Sassoon's poem, "The Heart's Journey":

"The stones remain; their stillness can outlast
The skies of history hurrying overhead."

Then we turn the page, and we see Sir Jocelyn Stevens saying something that I bet he has regretted ever since. It is the sort of thing you say; it is the sort of thing you mean:

"I can think of no better example to the world of how this country cares for its great heritage."

Yes. Quite. And that is the problem, because everyone has wanted to solve this problem at Stonehenge. We all know that we want to restore it to the grandeur of the time when there was little interference by man. We want to take the roads out of the landscape, do we do it with a tunnel or not?

We were all pretty surprised when the then Minister, Lady Blackstone, announced that they were going to build a long-haul tunnel beside the stones, and we said, "Hooray, but where is the money coming from?" But of course, earlier this year the Department for Transport said that it had no money, so that was all over and we had to go back to the drawing board.

We have had endless problems about the visitor centre and how it depends upon the tunnel or the road improvement, and if the Winterbourne Stoke bypass and the Countess road flyover are built without the tunnel there has to be a new public inquiry. It gets more and more convoluted. That is the problem. I honestly believe that our system of national government is not good at delivering this sort of project; it is just not designed to do it. Even when two Prime Ministers have been personally committed to trying to find a solution, they have not found it.

So we have to keep trying and we will keep trying. Meanwhile, the stones will not get damaged. They will be as mysterious and wonderful as ever. They deserve their designation as a world heritage site. But we should be increasingly ashamed of the visitor facilities there, and of the encroachment of the 20th and now the 21st century upon the landscape of the stones, and we must try harder.

I am still passionate about this and I believe that there are ways through. I am delighted that the Minister for roads has also had an open door and I know how much he wants to solve this. I know how much the Minister who will reply to today's debate does too, but we must go on until we do solve it; otherwise, we shall not be living up to our responsibilities as the keepers of a world heritage site like Stonehenge and Amesbury. We simply must do it. My plea to the Minister is that he uses his best endeavours and, much more than that, his charm, his guile and whatever else he can offer to help us do this, because everyone will be grateful to him: the local authorities, the local people, and the people travelling up and down from the west country.

My final point is that a world heritage site in this case is not just a heap of old stones. Stonehenge represents an important symbol of the history of our country and culture, but much more than that, it is the gateway to the west of England. The west of England is one of the most innovative, exciting, vibrant parts of the United Kingdom. We trade on our heritage, our environment, our beaches and our holidays. At the same time, we have—in my constituency at least—the lowest unemployment rate in the United Kingdom and the highest rates of economic activity. We have high technology, we have nanotechnology and we have science in bucketfuls, and yet the whole economy of south-west England comes to a halt at Stonehenge. Stonehenge ought to have a large road sign saying, "Gateway to the South-West"; instead, you get to Stonehenge and there is a big sign saying, "Road Closed".

That is the problem, because in the south-west of England the infrastructure investment has been poor over many years. We have not had road improvements. We have had to fight even to get the M5 designated a strategic route. The A303, which was always the second route to the south-west, has been downgraded. The Blackdown hills controversy cost us years. It cost the economy of the whole south-west years; it cost the tourist economy of the south-west huge amounts. It continues to cost everyone a great deal, not only in terms of money, but in terms of everything that world heritage sites stand for. There is every reason why the Government, as a whole, should get together to solve this problem: it is about the economy, the quality of life and the standard of living.

Only last night, some of us had a meeting with the South West of England Development Agency. It too recognises that the bottleneck of Stonehenge is having an adverse impact on the place of the south-west of England in the world, in terms of economy and quality of life. So the problem represented by Stonehenge is a massive problem, and I have not over-egged that in any sense. But at heart it is the stones that matter, and the landscape in which they lie. They matter to us and to our children and grandchildren, and we must crack this problem for their sake too. I put in a plea not just for all the world heritage sites to be in our hearts and minds as we think of everything that makes Britain so British, but for us to think in practical terms about the need to provide world-class visitor facilities. Britain is capable of the very best—we know that—but we are failing miserably at Stonehenge in 2005.

I hope that, by the middle of 2006, we will see the Government's working party produce a sensible plan that can be costed, afforded and implemented without delay. At that point, UNESCO can realise its dreams for the world heritage sites in this country, all of which are magnificent; indeed, I hope to see more. My hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) has in his constituency not only part of the Jurassic coast international site, but the Cornwall and west Devon mining landscape, which is the subject of a new application.

There is a huge task ahead. Everyone wants this to happen. Minister, please make it happen.

3.6 pm

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) on securing this debate. Before he was elected, I, as a student in Birmingham, regularly visited his constituency to see the Ironbridge site, which I have admired since the first time I saw it in 1975. I have been there many times since. I have not visited Ironbridge since he was elected, so I will inform him when I next decide to visit.

I wish to focus on two matters; I am aware that time is limited. First, I shall make a few observations about the world heritage site list and, secondly, develop another theme. Unlike other hon. Members who have spoken, I do not have a world heritage site in my constituency. However, in the northern region, we have two: Hadrian's wall and Durham cathedral and castle. I am happy that they are world heritage sites, but, if one goes further down the road, one finds York cathedral and city walls, which are not included in the list. That is surprising, given that the great Roman emperor Constantine was crowned in that city. That site should have been a candidate for the list. Somehow, it has been overlooked and does not appear on the list that I have seen on the internet.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright) on securing the debate. I was interested to hear the comments of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) about the Roman empire. I wonder whether he is aware that the proposed list includes the first multi-country bid for world heritage status for the frontiers of the Roman empire, including the Antonine wall in Bearsden, in my constituency. I would be interested to hear whether he believes that that should be included on the list.

Dr. Kumar: I heartily agree. The tentative list includes sites in the north-east, including Lindisfarne and Jarrow. It is amazing that they have not been considered, given the part they have played in history. In the dark ages, the torch of learning was kept alive at those sites, where men such as Bede kept our spirit alive. Further south, one finds Whitby, which has a great religious history, and was the site of the synod that effectively settled what we now know as the Christian doctrine. There is no recognition of that.

I believe that the list is subjective and selective. I know that the Minister is looking for ideas, so I suggest that he takes up some of my suggestions when advancing his programme. There is also a little bias, which has been hinted at earlier in the debate. A lot of the sites are all about stone and mortar. I recognise that it is about buildings: churches, cathedrals, castles, abbeys or palaces. That is fine, as they are part and parcel of our history, but that is a limited reflection of our heritage and world heritage. I want to explore that theme further.

We must consider things laterally. I am most interested in science and engineering, which the Minister knows I am passionate about. I care greatly for it. I studied it as a student and I worked for a living in that sector before I entered the House.

Nowhere in the list of UK world heritages sites is there any connection with the physical and natural sciences. The nearest that we get is the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew, the Royal Greenwich observatory and the maritime museum.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree, given his enthusiasm for engineering, that the Telford aqueduct should be on the list of heritage sites in Britain? Its bicentenary was held just a couple of weeks ago. It is a 200-year-old aqueduct that is still in use and it is an amazing engineering feat.

Dr. Kumar: I am happy to endorse that, because it fits into the theme that I am trying to explore. The contribution of science and technology needs to be incorporated into our heritage. Nowhere do I see any evidence that such an approach has been explored.

Great learned men and women have honoured this country in developing ideas. I am thinking of the Cavendish laboratory at Cambridge, a great institution where James Clerk Maxwell, Ernest Rutherford, James Chadwick and Nils Bohr made great contributions. They were great learned scholars in science. That is one institution that we should consider in terms of great world heritage sites. Matter was explored and the structure of the atom was investigated, as were all the forces of the universe, over a long period.

Many other institutions could be included, such as Manchester university, where great pioneering work was done in physics, discovering the nature and depth of the universe. They are great world heritage sites, which we ought to promote in our discussions from now on. I could suggest many other institutions, such as Woolsthorpe manor, which was the Lincolnshire home of Sir Isaac Newton. It is not on the list. He was a great pioneer, who broke frontiers of science. Newtonian physics lives with us to this day. There is an opportunity for us to explore that and to put it in the relevant category somewhere along the line.

It would be a great credit to UK heritage and world heritage if we could explore that theme. After all, the theme of this Government has been to promote science and technology and our great achievements. We have a great heritage. That is a further suggestion that the Minister can take away and perhaps explore. I am not saying that he must give me the answers today, but I am outlining an approach.

The Minister could also involve the scientific and engineering institutions—the Royal Society, the civil engineering organisations, the Institution of Chemical Engineers, of which I am a member, and other institutions—in considering whether such sites could be recognised in this respect in the future. I am not looking out for my constituency on the issue, because it has no world heritage sites, but the theme needs to be explored.

I know that time is limited. Perhaps the Minister can take some of those ideas away and, some years down the road, there might be some success.

3.15 pm

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): I shall be as brief as possible because other hon. Members wish to speak. I congratulate the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright) on securing this important debate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) said, we all appreciate greatly his work on the all-party parliamentary group.

World heritage sites are places of international importance for the conservation of our cultural and natural heritage. Examples include the great wall of China, the pyramids, the great barrier reef, Venice, the Tower of London and the Palace of Westminster. In Shipley, we are proud of the fact that Saltaire, including Salts mill, which hosts the Hockney collection, is on the list. I recommend all hon. Members to visit it. It is a fantastic place.

World heritage sites face several problems, which I hope the Minister will deal with in his response. I shall be parochial, stick to my patch, as my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury stuck to his, and discuss Saltaire. It was designated a world heritage site in 2001. No central agency has overall responsibility for the site. In effect, the management relies on everyone with an interest in the village working together. That includes all owners and occupiers of properties in Saltaire. A number of people do a great job. The Saltaire project team is a forum for key stakeholders at the world heritage site and involves local councillors. There is also the Saltaire village society, which is made up of representatives from the village. They have an important role in enhancing the look and attraction of Saltaire. I pay tribute to their work.

I shall touch on some issues rightly raised by the hon. Member for Telford. As for the financial burden of local authorities, I am sure that all Members are aware that the world heritage convention places several duties on the Government in respect of the management of world heritage sites to ensure that they are identified, protected, conserved and presented to the public. The responsibility for individual sites falls often at local government level. Each site must now have a management plan. It is recognised by most people that a co-ordinator post is fundamental to driving the implementation of the plans.

The post at Bradford was funded partially for three years by English Heritage, but that funding ends in April next year. Fortunately, Bradford metropolitan district council has stepped in, taken on the responsibility for the post and made it permanent. Other sites throughout the country are not as lucky and often find it difficult to retain long-term funding for such posts, which obviously creates concern about the continuity of the work. Although funding can be obtained for certain projects within a world heritage site, the local council often has to contribute to it.

I hope that the Minister will accept that there is a danger that those responsible for nominating sites for inspection to be included on the world heritage list may decide not to because of resource implications. It would be sad if that were decided on the grounds of which authority had the resources, not the importance of the site. Surely that should be the most important factor when deciding whether something is a world heritage site or not.

The hon. Member for Telford made a good point when he said that being designated as a world heritage site probably brings no additional legislative protection for that site. All the buildings in Saltaire are listed, which means that they have a high level of protection. However, that probably is not the case with all sites. Some additional protection for those important assets would be beneficial for those of us who represent constituencies with world heritage sites.

I refer now to joined-up government, a matter that I want the Minister to address. The Government have a responsibility to raise awareness of world heritage, but I am not aware of anything in the school curriculum raising awareness of world heritage matters. Saltaire has focused on links with the Highways Agency, which is responsible for the roads in the area. One of the pavements needed resurfacing. As anyone who has been to Saltaire will know, its significance rests in its housing, and its street surfacing is vital to the character of the place. To ensure that stone paving was used, rather than a concrete alternative, the council had to supplement the work financially, as the Highways Agency had no special provision in its budget for world heritage sites. I hope that the Government will address that point.

Saltaire is one of the most congested places in the whole Bradford district. That is recognised by the Highways Agency, which apparently has no money to sort it out. The last thing that we want is for those visiting Saltaire to be stuck in queues of traffic. What incentive would there be for them ever to return? I hope that the Government will work with the Department for Transport to ensure that the Highways Agency makes special provision for places with world heritage sites, in order to attract people there.

My final point, which I would like the Minister to address, is that some regulations seem to work against some world heritage sites. For example, signs cannot be put up on the motorway to promote Saltaire as a world heritage site, because the site is more than three miles from the motorway. Such regulation prevents world heritage sites from being promoted. It would be welcomed by people travelling on the M62 if there were something on that motorway saying, "Come to Saltaire, there is a world heritage site there."

Robert Key: I encourage my hon. Friend to challenge that ruling. It is a very important point. A long time ago, when I was Minister for Roads and Traffic, I received complaints from the dean and chapter of Ripon cathedral, because it was not allowed a sign on the motorway. Going to Dover on the motorway at that time, I discovered a brown sign for Rochester cathedral, which was further from the motorway than Ripon cathedral. So I tell my hon. Friend to challenge that ruling and really go for it.

Philip Davies: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that helpful advice. I am sure that my colleagues on Bradford metropolitan district council will challenge that ruling, but they were told that they were not allowed to put a sign on the motorway, because the site was more than three miles from it.

I again congratulate the hon. Member for Telford on all his hard work in the field, and on securing the debate. World heritage sites are an important part of our culture and heritage, and they deserve special protection. There are measures—often simple measures—that the Government could take that would do an awful lot to help those sites. I hope that the Minister can address some of those issues.

3.23 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): We have had a useful and valuable debate, with tremendous contributions. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) told us the great and sad story of Stonehenge. As I listened to him, I reflected that it was a huge pity that when the hon. Gentleman held his two ministerial posts, Sir Humphrey laid such a heavy hand on his shoulder, because with his passion and commitment to finding a solution to the problems of Stonehenge, I am convinced that if he had been given the necessary freedom in those posts, he would have got on and done something about it.

I shall return to the contribution of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) in a minute, but first I congratulate the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies), who talked passionately about his patch and the world heritage site of Saltaire in it, but who also rightly raised a number of concerns that are shared by others in the House, and I want to touch on those. I join the hon. Member for Salisbury in urging the hon. Member for Shipley to go back and have words about signage; I, too, am convinced that that problem can be solved. I notice that the Minister's Parliamentary Private Secretary is making detailed notes, so I am sure that if the hon. Gentleman talks to him afterwards, he will get some advice about that.

My greatest praise must be for the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright), who made an extremely good and comprehensive introductory speech. I also congratulate him on his re-election as chairman of the all-party group on world heritage sites. I am delighted to be one of the two vice-chairmen of that group, and am particularly delighted that the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire), the other vice-chairman, is here. I wish to take this first public opportunity to congratulate him on his recent elevation in the ranks of his party. I also put on record my thanks to English Heritage for the support that it now gives the all-party group, and add particular thanks to Sir Neil Cussons from that body for his inspiring contribution to our first meeting in this parliamentary Session.

I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak, because not only I am the vice-chairman, but I am proud to be the only Member of Parliament in the United Kingdom who can boast of having an entire city as a world heritage site in their constituency.

I want to begin my remarks, oddly, by making a few suggestions to the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland. I agreed with everything he said about reflecting the importance of science and engineering in the tentative list—and in the long term, I hope, in the actual list.

I hope that the Minister is listening to this next suggestion. Next year, 2006, will be the 200th anniversary of the birth of Isambard Kingdom Brunel. If we ask the question, "Who put the great in Great Britain?", we know from the recent poll that Churchill came first and I. K. Brunel came second. One of the best ways of reflecting that and meeting the hon. Gentleman's requirements would be to ensure that the Great Western railway gets the prominence that it deserves.

After all, it was Brunel's work on that railway that not only put Britain on the map, but showed the world how to set up mass transport. It is not Brunel's fault that on that railway there are some of the highest fares in Europe. Although many of the early railways have long since disappeared, the Great Western railway is not only still in operation, but able to carry the modern high-speed trains that, as the hon. Member for Salisbury said, enable us to travel to the sou'h-west.

Robert Key: High speed?

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman may doubt the speed, but he knows that with the new franchise, we have a commitment from First Group to provide better rolling stock on the line.

Perhaps the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland and my hon. Friend the Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson), who is no longer present, were guilty of trying to put too many sites on the tentative list. Now that we have the opportunity for only one key proposal, it will be even more difficult for GWR to be the one that we take forward.

Wherever world heritage sites are—Saltaire, Telford or anywhere else—we are proud of them, we know about their importance, we recognise their economic potential and we know that they are attractive to businesses and investment. After all, they have been singled out as the best examples in the world of places that people inhabit, visit and so on. I recognise the enormous benefit of that status, but it does not alter the fact that there are a number of problems, which other hon. Members have already described.

Bath, for example, has a large number of listed buildings. The people in listed buildings automatically have to apply for listed building consent to make any changes, but they do not have to pay for that, which puts financial pressure on the local authority. Because Bath is a world heritage city, if there is a major development and the developers come in, our local council planning department must do a huge amount of additional work. However, there is a cap on the amount of money that it can charge developers, which creates a huge strain.

Throughout the country, there is inconsistency in the funding, back-up and support for our 26 world heritages sites. Sadly, there are gaps in the conservation legislation and the listed building and scheduled monument legislation, down which we can fall.

There are huge pressures. The South West regional assembly, in developing its regional spatial plan, wants to create a huge amount of growth in Bath. There are huge consequences for the way in which we manage that growth while retaining the uniqueness that entitles us to call ourselves a world heritage city. We must find a way of resolving that conflict.

Only in the past couple of days, I received a letter from Bath's conservation officer with responsibility for world heritage. She writes:

"It is very hard to get environmental issues such as World Heritage status appropriately considered in the face of 'economic necessity', especially when we are talking about emotive (as well as essential) issues such as affordable housing and employment. But, and it's a big but, certainly with Bath and with most if not all other World Heritage Sites, we will be killing the golden goose if we allow inappropriate levels and types of development."

She is absolutely right. We must find solutions to that problem.

As the hon. Member for Telford said, management plans are part of the solution. This country led the way in putting them in place. Now, nearly all our world heritage sites have one, and soon all of them will. They are part of the way forward. However, unless we find resources for implementing them, we will be in difficulty, as the hon. Member for Shipley rightly said.

We must also take forward some of the other ideas that have been suggested. The Government are currently conducting a heritage protection review. Many of us would urge the Minister to provide statutory protection in one form or another for world heritage sites, and to ensure that it is the right sort of statutory protection. This cannot be done on some sort of consensual basis. A mandatory system must be put in place to get real protection. Perhaps the Minister will respond to those points.

As has been mentioned, there have been opportunities in respect of the register of historic sites and buildings and so on, but there are models—for example, areas of outstanding natural beauty and the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000—that we could pick up and run with quickly.

I am conscious that time is tight, so I must finish soon. In his extremely valuable contribution, the hon. Member for Telford discussed the need to start promoting the brand in this country, and he is absolutely right. My suggestions build on what he said. There are five key steps that we could easily take.

First, we should work hard to get all the United Kingdom's sites to use and prominently display the official world heritage symbol. Secondly, Ordnance Survey maps should show world heritage sites with the appropriate symbol on all its maps. Thirdly, VisitBritain should promote our world heritage sites much more effectively, particularly when it advertises overseas. Fourthly, let us persuade every site to distribute a leaflet that describes what is offered at the other sites in the rest of the country and overseas. Finally, let us find better ways of providing links between the sites—perhaps route maps and so on.

I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Telford that the 2012 Olympics will provide a target date for putting all those ideas in place. World heritage sites are fantastic. They are wonderful. We should be enormously proud of the 26 in this country, but they need more help, and I hope that in few minutes' time the Minister will describe how he will provide it.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): I call Mr. Hugo Swire.

3.33 pm

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Olner. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) will find me very forgiving if he seeks to intervene during my few remarks. In the spirit of consensus, I should like to join the universal gratitude of the House to the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright), who manfully continues the job that he started. I take this opportunity to congratulate him and the vice-chairman, while simultaneously apologising for not being able to make our meeting yesterday.

I would also like to take the opportunity—with your indulgence, Mr. Olner, lest this become a sort of end-of-term party—to thank the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) for congratulating me on my elevation to the shadow Cabinet. My only message to him, given the current questions over the leadership of his own party, is that the sky is the limit. I also extend my thanks to the Local Authority World Heritage Forum, as I suspect that much of the work falls on its shoulders. It does an excellent job.

It is appropriate that we are meeting here this afternoon. The hon. Member for Telford was right to point out that we are debating this topic in what is—although we often forget it—a world heritage site. As the chairman of the Speaker's Advisory Committee on Works of Art, I know that that sometimes causes problems. Who has the right to decide what statues stand in the square outside? It turns out that the answer to that is not Parliament, or even Parliament as a world heritage site; it is the Mayor of London. The fact that the Mayor has the right to decide what statues should stand opposite Parliament fills some of us with as much confidence as the Trojans had on discovering too late that the horse was hollow and had people inside it. I ask the Minister to look into the whole question of the Westminster world heritage site at some stage in the future, and find out whether we can bring within the competence of that site—and, perhaps, within the powers of Parliament—the right to control the place that we inhabit.

There is much talk about sites in the United Kingdom—that is what the debate is about—but our responsibilities extend beyond our national borders. We have responsibilities around the world. In my party's manifesto at the last election, I specifically included a token sum of £5 million from the lottery funds to protect British heritage overseas; there are many remnants of British history overseas, such as Shackleton's Antarctic huts. That sum might have been tokenistic, but it was indicative of our thinking and our aspiration. Funds would also have been made available for heritage sites in Iraq, such as Babylon, which suffered during coalition activity and attacks in the recent war in that country. Therefore, although our responsibilities are domestic, they extend beyond our national borders.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) is my almost near neighbour; he would be my near neighbour if the trains were faster and the roads better between Salisbury and East Devon. He referred—rather poetically, I thought—to the world heritage site that is partially in my constituency as "Jurassic Park". No doubt many of us in our part of the world would do well as extras in the film of that name, but the correct term for it is the Jurassic coast—in fact, the technical term for it is the Jurassic, Triassic and cretaceous coast; were I allowed to refer to those sitting at the back of the Chamber, I would no doubt be able to state that several of them were nodding in assent to that.

As we are all being a little partisan about our own sites, I shall take this opportunity to congratulate everyone in Devon and Dorset who worked so tirelessly to get us world heritage site status. The day we got it was a tremendous day. I should like to point out that we got it in the same year as Saltaire did, and somewhat after the city of Bath, which was awarded that status in 1987. My hon. Friend's very own Stonehenge was awarded it in 1986, which pips us all at the post.

I am interested in what the hon. Member for Telford said, and I look forward to hearing the Minister's comments. That there is no statutory provision for protecting world heritage sites is extraordinary. I would welcome receiving any information that the Minister might have on that. I question whether the DCMS register goes far enough, and what it is intended to do. I would also like to know how we could go further.

The thorny issue of resources is dear to my heart. We should not do world heritage sites on the cheap. We are in a competitive environment; we are competing with the very best around the world. Places should not be given world heritage site status and then, bang, they are on their own—but that is what tends to happen. In Jurassic park—or rather, on the Jurassic coast—we are trying to set up a themed walk with visitor centres, some of which might be in my constituency. There might be one at the start of the walk in Exmouth, another in Seaton and others in Dorset as well. There would be interpretive centres linked together all the way down the coast. But we are finding it extremely difficult to access funding and to get any body—such as the ODPM or the DCMS—interested in developing these ideas.

To give credit to all who are working on the project, I must add that the Jurassic coast is already recognised nationally and internationally as leading on sustainable tourism and public transport initiatives. It won the winter 2005 Tourism for Tomorrow destination award, and the Jurassic coast X53 service got an excellence passenger transport award and a national transport award. People are doing things, but often without much support from central Government.

There is also the wider issue of entertaining and looking after all those tourists who come to see our world heritage site. Amazingly, we have a shortage of hotel beds in my part of the world. No great thought seems to be given to what should happen next. Yes, the award was won on merit, but what happens next? What about the necessary infrastructure, both for the people who live there, so that their everyday lives are not impinged on unnecessarily, and for the tourists whom we want to come here to make the sites economically viable and sustainable in the longer term?

Mr. Dunne: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Swire: Of course.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. I recognise that it is your right to give way, Mr. Swire, but it is a bit of a cheek for someone who has been in the Chamber for only five minutes to seek to intervene.

Mr. Swire: I am between a rock and hard place, Mr. Olner; I am not sure whether it is Triassic or Jurassic. At the risk of incurring your wrath, I will give way to my hon. Friend, as long as his intervention is very short.

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and to you, Mr. Olner; I am duly chastised. My intervention relates to my hon. Friend's new responsibilities, on which I heartily congratulate him, and to the point made by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). Those new responsibilities cover the lottery funding that will go towards the Olympics. In view of the National Lottery Bill, I urge my hon. Friend to put pressure on the Minister to ensure that funding is available for the heritage aspect through the lottery, which has been somewhat curtailed as a result of the imposition of the Olympics.

Mr. Swire: My hon. Friend is right. There is a residual nervousness about the heritage sector losing out to other sectors in connection with the Olympics.

Mr. Foster rose—

Mr. Swire: The hon. Member for Bath has been here, Mr. Olner, so I will give way to him.

Mr. Foster: The hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) may just wish to remind his hon. Friend that as a result of a joint amendment that he and I tabled to the National Lottery Bill, which we will continue to pursue at the beginning of next year, we may be able to solve that problem.

Mr. Swire: You see, Mr. Olner, the Lib-Lab pact is not the only one. The hon. Gentleman is entirely correct.

I now have only a few minutes left, as the Minister needs sufficient time to answer all these questions. Yes of course we need to promote the brand nationally. The Olympics provide us with a wonderful opportunity to do so. There is some nervousness that the Olympic games will be London-centric. That would be inappropriate, particularly given this debate, which is about sites all around our country. I urge the Minister, when discussing the subject with officials and colleagues, to bear in mind that there is life outside London.

World heritage sites at risk, and future sites that may be threatened, have been briefly mentioned. That problem needs to be examined. We also need to spend a little more time, energy and—dare I say it?—resources, on the conservation of existing sites. That may be required as a result of wear and tear from the increase in visitor numbers, or there may be a need for sensitive development to enhance rather than detract from the sites.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury spoke about Stonehenge. I know a little bit about that. He has been kind enough to brief me in the past. I have had visits from people involved in the visitor centre in my constituency. Stonehenge is a token in my everyday life in a way, because I travel up and down the A303. I have my own reservations about some of the plans. The Countess roundabout is quite far away for a visitor centre, and there are issues about how one gets people from there to the site.

I have a residual sadness at the thought that one day I will travel up and down the A303 and not even see Stonehenge—but I am prepared to sacrifice my desires for the benefit of all. I understand that something needs to be done. The Minister could make his name here, because this argument has been around almost as long as the stones themselves. If he comes up with a workable solution on which we can all co-operate—it may not be the ideal solution, but it must be one that can be undertaken and enforced—he will have my support and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury.

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) made some very good points about what he wanted, given his background in science and engineering. I urge him to consider that not everything can be a world heritage site. If anything is to come out of this debate, for goodness' sake let it be that we spend a little more time on making what we have better, rather than just coming up with new ideas. Otherwise, the entire country could turn into a world heritage site. None the less, I take the hon. Gentleman's point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) talked about Saltaire, which received the same award in the same year as us—and a very good thing, too. He talked about Saltaire's connection with David Hockney, who is perhaps not so popular in Government circles these days, as he is, as it were, rubbing salt from Saltaire into the Government's wounds over their plans to ban smoking. Saltaire is an important site.

My hon. Friend made an important point about the school curriculum; the debate always returns to the school curriculum. The first people to whom we should speak about world heritage sites in the United Kingdom are our students, pupils and children, who are the citizens of tomorrow. If they do not take an interest, not only shall we not get many more world heritage sites but there will be no great hunger for them and no one to look after them. Therefore the school curriculum is incredibly important to preserving our heritage. I know that in his reply to the debate, the Minister will want to deal with each and every point that has been made.

3.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. David Lammy): In the time available, I want to respond to all the points that were raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright). I congratulate him on introducing an excellent debate on world heritage. It is important that we have the opportunity to discuss the issue, and it is appropriate that we are having the debate in Westminster Hall. I accept the points that the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) raised about the Mayor of London, and those points will arise again during next year's heritage protection review.

My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) made important points too. I take those on board, even if I may not have time to respond to them. The same goes for what was said by the hon. Members for Salisbury (Robert Key) and for Shipley (Philip Davies).

The hon. Member for Salisbury will know that I sympathise greatly with the case for Stonehenge. Stonehenge was the first heritage site that I visited, in my first few days in this post. The case to renew Stonehenge is well made, and we must work through the problems; I hope that I will have time to speak about them today. I sympathised with the hon. Gentleman when he spoke about the position that he found himself in with Sir Humphrey. He will see today that I have with me not just one but five Sir Humphreys. That is why it has been difficult to get White Hart Lane on to the tentative list.

I can tell the hon. Member for Shipley that I have been to Saltaire. I was there in May to help the former Member for Shipley, and I hope to visit Saltaire again in the years ahead.

We have had a good debate. The world heritage convention, which the UK signed in 1984, has proved to be an enormously effective and positive force in bringing together nations from all over the world to act collectively to safeguard sites of outstanding universal value. An inscription as a world heritage site, of which there are now more than 800 worldwide, is the highest accolade that a place can receive. An inscription brings with it real international prestige.

One of the first steps that this Government took was to rejoin UNESCO. We played a full part in supporting UNESCO and the world heritage committee's implementation of the world heritage convention. From 2001 to 2005 the UK was, for the first time, a full member of the world heritage committee. We left this year only because our term of office came to an end.

The work that we did has gained us huge international standing. During our time on the committee, we have supported developing countries as they put together their own nominations for world heritage inscription. We have participated in a full revision of the operational guidelines—the rule book that governs how the world heritage convention is implemented. We have supported the process for periodic reporting on world heritage sites across Europe and contributed funds for bilateral programmes to support world heritage in other parts of the world, including support for Anguilla and St. Lucia. We are now discussing a further programme based on sub-Saharan Africa with UNESCO.

We are delighted that through our membership, we have encouraged the world heritage committee to develop a strategy to manage the impact of climate change on world heritage sites. Next year, the UK is to host a meeting of experts to consider specifically the effect of climate change on our world heritage sites. Our aim is to pool expertise and develop management strategies across all regions of the world so that that important issue, which is bearing down on our sites, can be resolved.

I now turn back to our track record at home. The year 1997 saw the start of the review of the tentative list of sites recognised as having potential for future nomination as world heritage sites, and that redefined how we look at candidates for world heritage nomination, which now include not only iconic monuments—world-class though they are—but sites that epitomise Britain's achievements in leading the industrialisation of the world, and our global influence, as well as sites that reflect everyday life and industry. That goes to the heart of the contribution made by my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland, notwithstanding the fact that some of the sites that he wants to be included are not on the list.

The UK currently has 26 world heritage sites. As we have heard, there are 16 in England, four in Scotland, two in Wales, one in Northern Ireland and three in our overseas territories. They represent a tremendous spread, both geographically and in terms of type. They range from the town of St. George in Bermuda to the frontiers of the Roman empire, represented by Hadrian's wall, and from St. Kilda to the Blaenavon industrial landscape in Wales. They include, of course, the Ironbridge gorge. Eight sites from the tentative list have been inscribed since 1999.

The Government take seriously their responsibility for world heritage. Protection for world heritage sites is enshrined in the planning system; in England that is set out in PPG15 and the associated guidance, specifically for the home counties. Management plans for world heritage sites are an essential part of how we manage them; that approach has been adopted throughout the world, and is encouraged by UNESCO.

The management plan should govern how we bring about consensus among all the stakeholders involved in a world heritage site. Essentially, it is the partnership contract that enables all participants to work together. In 1997, one management plan had been completed; now, 22 have been, and work is in hand on the remaining four sites.

As a country, we have achieved a great deal, but the route to world heritage status is not easy. Such status brings advantages: prestige, recognition, public awareness and local pride. More weight is given to conservation and protection, and the status can bring economic advantage through increased tourism as part of an economic regeneration plan.

However, the status also brings questions about how the sites are to be managed. Increased visitor numbers can jeopardise the sustainable development of a site. A few months ago at Stonehenge, I saw how the flow of people was being managed. Particularly during the summer solstice, work with the police ensured that the volume of people coming to the site did not disrupt it for future generations. The Government are not complacent about those responsibilities, and today's debate has highlighted some of the issues that we face and how they relate to aspects of what the Government are attempting to do. We believe that there is more we can do to develop partnership by working even further at the national level through my own and other Departments and with agencies and non-governmental organisations such as English Heritage, the UK National Commission for UNESCO, the Local Authority World Heritage Forum and the all-party parliamentary group.

I shall now turn to some of the specific issues raised in the debate. I have said that I will announce the start of a review of the tentative list next spring. That will be a major lengthy undertaking on which we shall work closely with the devolved Administrations and the Crown dependencies. The points raised by my hon. Friend for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland are on the record, and he will no doubt want to play a role in that.

What has been said about statutory protection for our world heritage sites is important, and I totally understand the need for that as we move forward with the heritage review. A balance needs to be struck. Any new system must take account of the nature of world heritage sites, and enable them to extend across a wide area. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) raised that issue in the context of almost his entire constituency, and we will have to ensure that there is flexibility. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman would want to ensure that the entirety of Bath town centre was not included under some new system. We want to work through such issues, and we want hon. Members and the all-party group to help us as we begin to work out how inclusion of world heritage sites might look in a new unified register.

I fully recognise the important points that my hon. Friend the Member for Telford made about promotion and marketing of our heritage sites. I recognise the importance of world heritage sites in attracting visitors to the UK. That is the key reason for the heavy involvement of VisitBritain in promoting heritage sites, and I am pleased that it is launching its Enjoy England 2006 campaign tomorrow. That will play a role in promoting world heritage more widely, particularly after the problems that we had in London this summer, which affected tourism in this country to some extent.

As for the pressure that is rightly placed on local authorities and the funding issues that arise from that, there is a quid pro quo. Designation as a world heritage site means that in a fairly competitive field—we have heard about some of the other places that could be world heritage sites—people are attracted to a particular place. They want to come to it, and that in itself benefits the local economy. During the next few months, my officials are discussing further with English Heritage the central support that might be needed for world heritage sites in the light of information coming out of the recent periodic reporting exercise.

It is important to emphasise—this has not been mentioned so far—the huge role that the Heritage Lottery Fund plays in supporting our world heritage sites. It has given more than £85 million towards them since 1994, and as I examine the list of the money that it has provided, there is not a site mentioned in the debate that has not received some money from the fund. It stands ready to receive applications if there are particular needs—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. The clock has beaten us, and we must move on to the next debate.

Motorway Building (Compensation)

4 pm

David Heyes (Ashton-under-Lyne) (Lab): I am grateful to have been granted this Adjournment debate on a matter that has had an impact on many hundreds of my constituents and, I suspect, many thousands of others throughout the country—people who live near newly constructed highways, and who should be entitled to financial compensation under the law.

In October 2000, the long-awaited and much-needed final section of the M60 motorway opened to complete the missing link in the Manchester outer ring road. The motorway runs right through the heart of my constituency, between junctions 22 and 23. The road has transformed communications on the eastern side of the Greater Manchester conurbation, and we are seeing some real economic regeneration benefits in such areas as Hollinwood junction and Ashton Moss.

The opening of the motorway came as a great relief to many of my constituents, some of whom had waited more than 40 years since plans were first published. During that time, the area suffered greatly from the effects of blight, and during the five-year construction period, people suffered even more from the consequent noise, dust, dirt and traffic disruption.

Most significantly, once the motorway was opened, people faced the further consequence of the loss of property values as a result of their proximity to the new road. It came as good news to thousands of local residents to discover that under part 1 of the Land Compensation Act 1973 they were at last to qualify for some financial compensation.

I should declare an interest as I live close to the new motorway. Potentially, like so many of my constituents, I shall be entitled to compensation under the 1973 Act. We became aware of our entitlement because of a widely circulated Highways Agency leaflet telling us about the scheme and what we needed to do to pursue a claim. The leaflet includes these words:

"If you have employed an agent and your claim is successful then the Highways Agency will also pay their reasonable costs, as agreed by the valuer".

For many people, the prospect of making a claim seemed daunting. However, in the run up to the motorway opening and immediately after, people in the affected area started to receive letters from firms of chartered surveyors offering to process their claims. All stated that because the Highways Agency would pay a fee to the agent, there would be no charge for the service. Understandably, most residents signed up with the agents, and I am aware of many who have received their compensation and are satisfied with the surveyors who acted on their behalf.

I first became aware in August of the problems that I want to outline, when a constituent complained to me about the chartered surveyor who was acting on his behalf. The surveyor wrote to him in April 2003, assuring him that "there will be no cost to you for our services whatever the outcome."

The phrase was in bold type, and it was the only part of the letter emphasised in that way. A subsequent letter in May 2003 said that the agent was "pleased to confirm that our costs will be paid by the compensating authority".

Both letters were written in reassuring and accessible language, and, understandably, my constituent felt comfortable engaging the professional services of a firm of chartered surveyors to pursue his claim free of charge.

I shall fast forward almost two years to January this year when my constituent received another letter from his agent advising that he was pleased to report that the compensating authority had made an offer of £1,000 to settle his claim. However, further in the letter came the bad news, and I shall read some key extracts. The surveyor's third letter says:

"You will recall that in previous correspondence we stated that the compensating authority are obliged to pay our reasonable costs."

In fact, in the first two letters, there was no mention of "reasonable costs", although it is used in the Highways Agency literature. The surveyor's letter continues:

"Unfortunately, we have not been able to agree our fee with the compensating authority for the work that we have carried out on your behalf. The reason for this is that the Highways Agency has withdrawn from a provisional agreement made with them and their valuation advisers last September."

The letter continues to allege that the Highways Agency had refused to meet the agents to discuss the issue, and offers the client three options. The first option is:

"To refer the matter to the Land Tribunal for determination. Although it is possible to make the application yourself we would recommend that you take appropriate legal advice as this can be a costly legal process and as with all such references the costs involved are not necessarily recoverable even if the reference is successful."

That is a change from the reassuring and simple language of the initial letters to a much more technical style. Strangely, that so-called option refers to determination; yet the beginning of the letter suggests that the Highways Agency has already made the offer of a settlement figure. Even stranger, elsewhere in the same letter the agent refers to "significant risks involved in making such a reference" to the Land Tribunal, and cautions against that course of action.

The second option is for the client to wait until the fee negotiations are concluded. However, the agent warns that:

"Unfortunately not only is there little prospect of reaching agreement with the Highways Agency within the next few months, it may not be possible to reach agreement through negotiation and therefore the dispute may remain unresolved until it is determined through legal action."

The third and final option offered to my constituent was:

"To make a contribution towards the difference between the amount which the Highways Agency are prepared to pay and the costs we have incurred. As a valued client we are not asking you to pay the full amount."

[David Heyes]

In this case, the amount requested was £50, although I am now aware of other cases where the amount was much greater.

My constituent found none of the options in that letter to be reasonable. However, he felt that he had no choice but to pay the additional fee, being left with the clear impression that he might never get the compensation if the Highways Agency and the agent did not reach an agreement. Faced with Hobson's choice—that is, no real choice at all—my constituent reluctantly paid up.

In March 2005 the Highways Agency wrote to my constituent, confirming the amount of compensation and asking him to complete and sign an acceptance form. They also advised that his agent would be paid £326.65 for representing him. This infuriated my constituent, who wrote to the agent on his own behalf, and on behalf of three neighbours, saying:

"After studying item three of your January letter . . . we wrongly assumed that we would have to pay this £50 fee before you would take further action on our behalf."

He also pointed out that neighbours who had refused to pay that extra fee were told that it would be waived, and that they received their settlement at the same time as people who did pay. He correctly states that he was never told that the Highways Agency would pay the agent the fee of £326.65, and therefore requested a refund of his own £50 fee, and those of his three neighbours—who are, incidentally, all elderly widows.

Let me emphasise the point. That means a charge of £376.65 for negotiating a claim valued at only £1,000. Even at that stage, my constituent did not feel the need to turn to his MP. By August, he had written a further two letters, but had had no response other than a holding letter in July, advising that the person he had written to was on leave and would respond on his return two weeks later. As of today, my constituent has still not had the courtesy of a response, and has certainly not had his £50 refunded.

I agree wholeheartedly with my constituent that the three choices offered to him were not really choices at all. As I said earlier, it just so happens that my own home is close to the M60 and I am likely to be eligible for compensation under the scheme. Like my constituent, I received the first two standard letters from the same firm of chartered surveyors, reassuring me that it would act on my behalf at no cost. As it is a member of the respected Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, I, like so many of my constituents, put my trust in it.

I, too, have since received the third letter offering me the same three options. I replied making it clear that I had no intention of paying the extra fee and that I would hold the firm to our original agreement. I also challenged that practice on behalf of my constituents. Unlike them, I did receive a response—in fact, a rather swift and lengthy one—from the senior partner in the firm. He told me that "it is true that in some instances we have waived our request for a contribution".

He also said:

"If none of our clients paid a contribution we would not be in business today, however if the majority pay then we can occasionally afford to waive the contribution."

He offered to waive it in my own case. Needless to say, I would not contemplate accepting that offer while many of my constituents have felt obliged to pay. Indeed, I now have no intention of progressing my own claim until a satisfactory conclusion is reached on the matter.

Although there are several firms acting as agents in the M60 compensation process, I am aware of only two that have requested additional fees from clients. They are Thomson Broadbent of Wellingborough, which is acting on my behalf and that of my constituent, and, to a lesser extent, the Davies Partnership of Ledbury. That calls into question the claim that Thomson Broadbent would go out of business if it was not paid the additional fee by most of its clients. Other chartered surveyors are dispensing their duty to clients in good faith, consistent with their original offer of representation free of any charge to the client.

Since August, I have pursued a number of avenues in relation to this matter. I suspected that the few cases of which I had been made aware might be just the tip of the iceberg. I promoted the matter through some articles in the local press, which prompted dozens of calls from people who had had similar experiences. I now have a file containing details of about 100 people, many from my own constituency and others from neighbouring constituencies. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Gwynne) for allowing me to include his constituents in the evidence that I have presented to the various agencies.

The same pattern emerges from most of those cases. Most are clients of Thomson Broadbent. All were originally promised that the agent would act free of charge. All were subsequently asked for an extra contribution, being offered that as one of three options. All had inferred that to pay up was the only way to receive compensation within a reasonable time scale. Some paid up and, like my constituent, later discovered that their surveyor was also paid a substantial fee by the Highways Agency. Others simply refused to pay. Many had realised that there was no correlation between whether they paid the fee and the timing of their claim being settled. All felt aggrieved to have been treated in that way by firms in which they had placed their trust.

I have written to the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors asking it to investigate whether the actions of its members contravene its code of conduct and, if so, what it intends to do. I have given details of the 100 or so cases of which I am aware and I await its response. I hope that it will see that the dubious practice of some of its members reflects badly on the profession, and that its many reputable members risk being tarred with the same brush. However, I am not confident that any sanction that the institution might be minded to impose would be sufficient to prevent that practice from continuing in my constituency and elsewhere.

I have also written to the Office of Fair Trading. I received a reply last week and I was astounded to be told that there is no legislation that it can use to prevent the practice of requesting an extra fee after initially agreeing to act on a free-of-charge basis. After I received the letter, I contacted the OFT again and was assured by the deputy director of UK enforcement that that was the case. I question the validity of current fair trading legislation if the practice that I have described is not considered illegal, and the watchdog that should be able to challenge it seems to be so toothless.

I shall turn now to the role of the Highways Agency in the matter. I am not sure to what extent the actions of the agency may have brought about the difficulty in the first place. Moreover, I am not convinced that it has acted with sufficient determination to bring about a solution. I have written to, and met, senior managers from the Highways Agency. They dispute the allegation that they have withdrawn from an agreement.

From that meeting, and from correspondence with Thomson Broadbent, I now have a clearer understanding of the dispute between the Highways Agency and the agents. It appears that the fees for surveyors acting in compensation cases used to be paid in accordance with something called Ryde's scale, which was last reviewed in 1996, and before that was typically reviewed every six or seven years. However, in 2002 the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister announced that there would be no further review of the scale, which suggests that no fee increases have been agreed since 2002. If that is the case, I have some sympathy with surveyors, other than those who have chosen to offload the burden on to their clients. I am told that the scale was discontinued to encourage appropriate parties to seek to agree fees among themselves, and that the principal cause of the change was that Ryde's scale was generally too low. I am also told that the scale covered compulsory purchases, as well as part 1 compensation, but that the discontinuation of the scale has proved to be much more problematic in the case of part 1 compensation.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to tell me whether he believes that the Highways Agency has acted properly to resolve the dispute with the agents, or whether it is to some extent responsible for the delay in resolving it. I was encouraged to learn that consultants have recently been engaged by the Highways Agency in an attempt to navigate a way out of the current impasse. I would be interested to know how the negotiations are progressing and whether my hon. Friend the Minister will press the Highways Agency to find a resolution. If he agrees that the request for an extra fee is unacceptable, will he act to stop it? Will he press for the inclusion in any deal of a requirement that firms of surveyors should pay back any top-up fees that had needlessly been paid by my constituents?

I urge my hon. Friend to do everything in his power to encourage the parties to the dispute to find a solution that is fair to all, and particularly that my constituents get the compensation to which they are legally entitled—at no cost to them.

4.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (David Heyes) on securing this important debate on what I know is a significant issue for many of his constituents. I congratulate him also on his diligent work in bringing the matter to the attention of Ministers, and on the work that he has done—I know that he has engaged in a large amount of correspondence.

Through his correspondence with my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department for Transport, my hon. Friend is aware that the Highways Agency is currently negotiating reasonable fees with agents representing claimants under part 1 of the Land Compensation Act 1973. That Act compensates those whose properties have been reduced in value by physical factors such as the noise, lighting or fumes that arise from the use of a new or improved road.

The agency fully recognises its statutory obligations to reimburse successful claimants for the reasonable fees of their agents. It remains committed to working with the agents to find a fair solution to the fee issue. I shall refer shortly to the positive steps that have been taken to reach an agreement, about which my hon. Friend has asked a number of questions.

Historically, Ryde's scale was the basis for the settlement of agents' fees. The scale was agreed jointly by the profession and the Government. As my hon. Friend said, it was abandoned in 2002 by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, in consultation with the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, because it was viewed as being uncompetitive and out of step with the remuneration of other professions.

As my hon. Friend is aware, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has advised that there are no plans to reinstate Ryde's scale or to replace it. The ODPM stated in July 2002 that fees should normally be assessed on a reasonable basis, agreed between parties. Fixed scale fees were abandoned on 18 July 2002. However, in the absence of an agreed formula, the Highways Agency continued until March 2004 to settle claims on the basis of Ryde's scale without dispute.

A group of chartered surveyors then requested that the Highways Agency increase fees by 20 per cent. above those allowed for in Ryde's scale. The agents argued that Ryde's had not been reviewed for many years and their costs had risen considerably. The agency asked independent valuation contractors whether a 20 per cent. increase was justified, but they were of the view that the scale was sufficiently generous for the market and that fees had increased with the level of compensation and property values. They also advised that a reasonable settlement should reflect the economies of scale obtained by the agents in handling compensation claims.

The agency carried out further investigations to corroborate the findings of its valuers. It sought the views of others, including Transport for London, which was also of the opinion that Ryde's scale was generous.

My hon. Friend is aware, I am sure, that this is not a simple dispute to resolve. The agency and the claimants' agents are not contractually linked, and the solution goes well beyond the determination of individual claims. It has implications for all compensating authorities, and it will have an impact on thousands of part 1 claims—and on the public purse. As one of the larger compensating authorities, others look to the agency to set a benchmark on fees; accordingly, it has acted prudently and correctly throughout.

The agency has held numerous discussions with representatives of the major agents and has also talked to other compensating authorities and the RICS. As a result, in March 2005, the agency made a two-stage offer which, if it had been accepted, would have led to a settlement based on measured evidence of the time taken to negotiate a part 1 claim.

In response to this, the agents stated in April 2005 that it was impossible for them to keep accurate timesheets. The agency then proposed on 19 May 2005 that agents recommend an independent consultant to investigate the fee issue. The agents accepted this approach. However, on 17 August 2005 they reported that they had met with no success in finding a suitable person or organisation.

As my hon. Friend is aware, the agency is currently working to find a suitable consultant. I am pleased to say that it has selected a firm of consultants that has considerable and far-reaching experience in determining the fee levels through negotiation and dispute resolution. The appointment will be announced shortly. Throughout the process, the agency maintained a dialogue with the major agents and kept them fully informed.

During the study, the consultants all worked closely with the agency and the claimants' agents under the compensating authorities. The agency, for its part, will do its best to find a solution.

David Heyes: On that point, will my hon. Friend urge the parties to this process—which I am happy is now in train and I obviously welcome it—to look at the issue of people who have made these top-up payments to firms of surveyors and who, should a better scale of fees be agreed retrospectively, stand to lose out financially. Can some way be found of recompensing them for the money that they have paid out in good faith?

Derek Twigg: If agreement is reached on a higher fee, the agency will give sympathetic consideration to the reimbursement of those who have already paid an additional sum to their agents. The RICS was also asked to act as an arbiter but it has declined to be involved.

As I said, during the study the consultants will work closely with the agency and the claimants' agents and other compensating authorities. The agency, for its part, will do its best to find the solution. The consultant's report should be available in the new year and it is hoped that it will give all parties the clarity that they require.

I share my hon. Friend's concerns about the actions of individual agents who are requesting additional sums from the clients pending a general settlement of fees, following the abolition of Ryde's scale. It is for individual claimants and their agents to agree or waive this payment and it remains a private contractual matter in which the agency cannot intervene. The agency does not have the authority to prevent agents from acting in this unprofessional way towards its customers.

The agency has referred the matter to the RICS, which has declined to be involved in the general settlement of fees. I was advised that it does not consider that it is wrong for members to renegotiate the terms of a contract.

If claimants seek the agency's guidance, they are told that they are free to choose whoever they wish to represent them. Alternatively, clients are within their rights to deal directly with the Highways Agency and it will offer them every assistance. The agency already has a leaflet given to all claimants that explains the compensation process. A detailed booklet is currently being drafted, which will be made available to the public before new road schemes are opened to enable a more informed choice of an agent to be made.

I should like to reassure my hon. Friend that the Highways Agency is firmly committed to the resolution of this issue. Putting the specific question of fees to one side, the working relationship the agency enjoys with the agents has developed in the spirit of partnership. The agency will do all that it can to reach a solution that is acceptable to all parties.

Artificial Sweeteners

4.25 pm

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I am grateful for the opportunity to have this debate. For almost a year, I have been looking into the safety of the artificial sweetener, aspartame, and I was truly horrified by what I discovered. When I began my research, I was unconvinced by the off-the-wall internet conspiracy theories. I am a man of science, not of the internet. However, a number of eminent academics from the UK and further afield have persuaded me beyond doubt that aspartame represents a serious health problem.

There is strong scientific evidence that the components of aspartame and their metabolites can cause very serious toxic effects in humans. There is also a wealth of subjective evidence that suggests a range of adverse neurological reactions to aspartame. Most importantly, undoubted scientific evidence was published in a top peer-reviewed journal last month that showed that long-term aspartame use causes cancer in rodents. The World Health Organisation recognises such findings in rats as highly predictive of carcinogenic risk for humans.

The history of aspartame's approval is mired in controversy, not least because of the likes of Donald Rumsfeld "calling in his markers" to get it approved. The science that supported its approval was biased, inconclusive and incompetent. Aspartame is in a higher category of risk than Sudan 1, the UK's fastest recalled food substance. However, bad science, bad regulation and bad politics have left the bigger of those two threats in everyday products on our supermarket shelves.

Aspartame is consumed every day by an average of one in 15 people worldwide, most of whom are children. How many children in Britain do not consume Walker's prawn cocktail crisps, Orbit or Airwaves chewing gum, Robinson's fruit squash, Lucozade or Diet Coke? Aspartame is even found in Centrum Kidz multivitamins, Lemsip cold and flu sachets for children, and Nurofen Meltlets for children. Those are the very products that are designed to cure our children when they are sick.

The economic reality of a sweetening agent that costs one third of the price of sugar means that it is present in no fewer than 6,000 foods, drinks and pharmaceutical products in our supermarkets. The history of the approval of this ubiquitous product puts public health regulators and politicians to shame. Health regulators are set up to ensure that substances that reach our food shops are safe for human consumption. The average citizen does not—and should not have to—question the safety of every product on sale in a supermarket. Nor should the average citizen have to question the processes that lead to the licensing of a product. The public should be able to meet—and have trust in—the regulatory experts. However, in licensing aspartame for public consumption, UK and international health regulators did not perform the one task that they were set up for, namely to protect the public.

Crucial questions that have been largely repressed since the early '80s hang over aspartame's safety. When journalists attempted to tackle those questions, their newspapers were threatened with intimidating letters from the industry's lawyers. I am duty-bound by the immunity afforded to me under parliamentary privilege—and as a servant of the public—to initiate a debate that has been silenced for over two decades.

I believe that aspartame should never have been licensed for use as a low-calorie sweetener in foods and drinks, and that there is compelling and reliable evidence for this carcinogenic substance to be banned from the UK food and drinks market. I call on the Government to ban the use and sale of aspartame.

What is in aspartame that merits a ban? The chemical breakdown of aspartame reveals three basic components: a methyl ester and two amino acids; phenylalanine and aspartic acid. The sweetener industry will say that those three components occur naturally in fruit, eggs and alcohol. Those compounds are, they argue, harmless or even beneficial to humans. However, those simple truths hide the complex science that makes every one of those components, when found in aspartame, harmful to humans. Molecules that can be good or harmless to the human body are not always so. Factors such as the compounds that the molecules form, the substances with which they are ingested and the concentrations in which they are absorbed can make the difference between an innocuous substance and a toxic substance.

In their natural form, the first two components, phenylalanine and aspartic acid, help keep humans healthy. In foods like meat, fish, dairy products, vegetables and eggs, phenylalanine and aspartic acid are bound to other amino acids in long, complex chains of proteins. When proteins are broken down into their constituent parts during digestion, the protein's amino acids compete with each other for absorption into the human body. That dilutes the risk of a dramatic rise in one single substance in the blood stream, which is when damage is most liable to occur. However, when present in aspartame neither phenylalanine nor aspartic acid are bound to complex chains of amino acids. Enzymes in the gut can easily split them apart. When phenylalanine is released in its free form, it is metabolised into diketopiperazine or DKP, which is a suspected carcinogen.

A similar process occurs when aspartic acid enters the bloodstream. In its free form, aspartic acid becomes an excitotoxin, a toxic molecule that stimulates nerve cells to the point of damage or death. That can have an adverse effect from the twitching of a hand to a grand mal seizure. Studies by Meldrum attest to the damaging effect of free aspartic acid in the human body. If both of the amino acids in aspartame are potentially very harmful to humans, the third component—methyl ester—is the most harmful and potentially lethal component. As soon as it is ingested, the methyl ester is metabolised by the body into methanol. Methanol is a well-known poison.

In the United States, the Environmental Protection Agency defines safe consumption of methanol as no more than 7.8 mg per day. That means that anyone drinking three cans of a drink sweetened with aspartame is consuming about 56 mg of methanol, eight times the EPA limit. Like phenylalanine and aspartic acid, methanol is naturally present in a regular diet of fruit, vegetables and even alcohol. However, as with phenylalanine and aspartic acid, those everyday occurrences of methanol do not make it safe in aspartame. In those natural occurrences, the body is shielded from methanol's adverse effects by two protective substances, pectin and ethanol.

The human body lacks the enzyme required to cleave methanol from pectin in fruit and vegetables, so the methanol is never released into our bodies. Moreover, when consuming alcoholic drinks, which almost always contain methanol impurities, the body is protected by the preferential metabolism of ethanol. There is so much more ethanol than methanol in alcohol that the body does not have time to metabolise the methanol before it is excreted naturally through breath and urine. A human being would need to drink 58 bottles of Jack Daniels in one go to reach potentially toxic levels of methanol through alcohol.

When we ingest aspartame, things are different. Humans do possess the enzyme required to separate methanol from the amino acids. The methanol is then released in its free form and absorbed into the body, according to Davoli's paper in 1986. During the digestion of aspartame, methanol is not coupled with the natural protection of ethanol or pectin, and that leaves us exposed to its toxic properties. However, then comes the alarming part: methanol is unstable in the human body and so gets converted into formaldehyde. Reference to that can be found in the papers of Kavet in 1990 and Trocho in 1998. Let us be clear that formaldehyde is a class A poison, which was used to prevent dead bodies from decaying.

Do we really want our children exposed to an embalming fluid? Some of the formaldehyde accumulated in the body will be converted into formic acid, a potent toxin, which can cause central nervous system depression and, in sufficient quantity, coma and death. Many human studies show the adverse effects from chronic, low-level formaldehyde exposure. Crucially, in 1998 Trocho demonstrated that, even when consuming small doses, severe problems occur from the gradual accumulation of formaldehyde in the body, which cannot be excreted.

Adverse effects include irreversible genetic damage from long-term, low-level exposure shown by Shaham in 1996, low birth weight shown by Maroziene's research in 2002 and cytogenic effects of blood lymphocytes, under Suruda's paper in 1993. The Suruda research that shows the degeneration of white blood cells is particularly relevant in the light of the evidence from the World Health Organisation's International Agency for Research on Cancer. A working group looking into the toxicity of chemicals in humans found that exposure to formaldehyde induced leukaemia—a cancer of the white blood cells—and cancer of the nose and throat. Surely, if aspartame metabolites have been shown to cause cancer in humans, we should be more concerned about the safety of the entire product. How can the Government, faced with those facts, still hope to reassure regular consumers of diet cola and other products containing aspartame that they do not run a significantly higher risk of developing cancer as a result of drinking them?

Before considering the studies revealing the dangers of aspartame itself, it is worth reflecting on the magnitude of the risks of the product and its metabolites. Hon. Members will no doubt remember the scandal in February this year, when Sudan 1 dye found in food in the UK led to possibly the biggest and fastest ever food recall that this country has ever known. A human being would have had to consume 3 tonnes of Worcestershire sauce every day for two years for potentially harmful effects to occur from tiny doses of Sudan 1 in foods. Despite that minimal risk, however, it was removed immediately.

Sudan 1 was found to be carcinogenic in 1975, but despite that it was placed in the least dangerous of the three WHO categories of carcinogenic substances. Aspartame, which is found in 10 times more products is, on the basis of the ground-breaking Ramazzini study, in WHO category 2, which is potentially far more dangerous to humans.

The Ramazzini study, to which I will return in depth later, revealed a repeated incidence of malignant tumours in rats after moderate regular consumption. Will the Minister explain why the treatment of aspartame, which is still in 6,000 supermarket products today, has been so different from that of Sudan 1?

The toxicity of aspartame's individual components is surely sufficient for us to be alarmed about its widespread use in the products that we and our children consume every day. But consumers and scientists alike have shown there is cause for concern from the regular consumption of products containing aspartame. The US Food and Drug Administration website lists more than 9,000 aspartame-related health complaints, but this could be just the tip of the iceberg.

Health professionals are often unable to diagnose a case of aspartame toxicity when they see one—after all, doctors are not currently trained to recognise it—and a number of cases have been misdiagnosed. A number of independent studies have shown that aspartame toxicity mimics conditions such as multiple sclerosis, Parkinson's disease, Alzheimer's disease, arthritis, chronic fatigue syndrome, panic disorder, lupus, diabetes, lymphoma, depression and other psychological disorders. It is perhaps not so surprising therefore that, frustrated by repeated flawed diagnosis, some people have turned to support groups as a method of sharing case history and exchanging information, some of which even leans towards the hysterical.

The final nail in the coffin for aspartame must surely be the monumental Ramazzini study. The research by the independent European Ramazzini Foundation in Bologna was published online in the highly acclaimed and peer-reviewed Environment Health Perspectives journal last month. It should have set alarm bells ringing in health departments around the world.

The conclusions of the Ramazzini study deserve painstaking dissection. It was, without a doubt, the most large-scale, comprehensive study ever performed on aspartame. The study looked at the effects of aspartame on 1,800 male and female rats, using six different control doses. Most studies use only around 400 rats and three usage doses, so it is easy to see why the Ramazzini study is so much more statistically significant than anything done before.

The Italian study allowed the animals to live out their full life of about three years, rather than culling them after two years as sometimes happens. That is particularly crucial, as tumours both in animals and humans are much more prevalent in later life. This vast study demonstrated that aspartame administered at varying levels in feed causes a statistically significant increase of lymphomas and leukaemias, malignant tumours of the kidneys in female rats and malignant tumours of peripheral and cranial nerves in male rats. Such tumours occurred even in two of the doses that were well below the acceptable daily intake recommended by regulatory authorities in the EU and the US.

There has been a wealth of compelling and rigorous research showing aspartame to be harmful, which culminated in last month's comprehensive Ramazzini study. How has the industry responded to such an overwhelming volume of sound science? I met industry representatives in October and if they were not scientifically illiterate, they were certainly very misinformed as to the credentials of the Ramazzini study, which they presented as worthless, unpublished and un-peer-reviewed. Holland Sweetener, Ajinomoto and NutraSweet must think that they are very convincing when they claim that aspartame is the safest product on the market by virtue of the 500 studies attesting to its safety. One can test a product 4,000 times, but if the tests are badly conducted and planned in such a way as to yield the desired results, its safety will always be questionable. In reality, the contrast between the quality of the science in the Ramazzini study and the industry studies could not be more clear or more damaging to the industry.

Serious doubts have been raised that suggest links between the results of scientific research and the body responsible for funding it. Professor Ralph Walton, who is present today, demonstrated in 1996 that of the 166 studies conducted on aspartame's safety deemed relevant to humans, 74 were sponsored by the aspartame industry and 92 were independently funded. Of the 92 non-industry sponsored studies, 92 per cent. identified one or more problems with aspartame's safety. The industry-sponsored studies, on the other hand, found unanimously in favour of aspartame's safety.

The industry has also suggested that aspartame is essential for helping diabetics. Although the American Diabetes Association, which incidentally receives considerable funding from the aspartame industry, claims that aspartame is useful in managing diabetes, there is plenty of evidence to the contrary. Diabetic management is much more complex than simply avoiding sugar. Total calorific intake is far more significant than whether or not a diabetic patient takes a small amount of sugar. Aspartame is known to interfere with the synthesis of serotonin, a neurotransmitter important in appetite regulation. Emerging evidence suggests that aspartame can lead to carbohydrate craving, a devastating situation for a diabetic. The stimulation of insulin release by a non-nutritive substance such as aspartame could potentially lead to hypoglycaemia. Animal studies by Sardesai and Dunbar conclude that aspartame may adversely affect the capacity to control glucose in a diabetic. Diabetic specialists, such as Roberts and Barua, have published extensively on problems of diabetic management caused by aspartame. So, even on diabetes, the industry's arguments have been shown to be highly contestable, at the very least.

On the question of who to trust on the competing scientific tests—be they on diabetes or aspartame safety—the track record of the industry should leave us in no doubt. The history of aspartame's approval is one in which sound science and proper regulatory and political independence seem to be notable by their absence. Aspartame was first licensed in the United States in 1981. Searle, the chemical company that discovered it, submitted a host of tests to the FDA in the hope of getting it approved. It was granted a provisional licence in 1974. However, when flaws were revealed in the science behind another Searle product—Flagyl—later that year, aspartame's impending licence was brought into question.

The FDA set up a taskforce to investigate 15 of the key aspartame studies submitted by Searle. Dr. Bressler was commissioned to investigate three of those studies. Due to insufficient funds, the FDA submitted the other 12 studies to be analysed by a body called universities associated for research and evaluation in pathology, which was under contract with Searle and which unsurprisingly declared all 12 studies to be authentic. Aspartame was recommended for approval.

Meanwhile, Dr. Bressler reported to the FDA in early 1976. He found no fewer than 52 major discrepancies in Searle's clinical conduct of its toxicological studies. They included no clear record being kept of the doses fed to rats; antibiotics being given to animals showing symptoms but not being reported; tumours contracted by rats during the experiment being surgically removed before dissection and not reported; and, above all, no clear record of death. One record shows an animal was alive, then dead, then alive, then dead. Yet despite the 52 major discrepancies, FDA scientists were overruled by the FDA's administration, which seems to have been more concerned with safeguarding the institution's reputation after having been initially misled by unreliable data.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Gentleman should be concluding his remarks, because I want to give the Minister at least 15 minutes to reply to the serious allegations that he is making.

Mr. Williams: I will quickly draw to a conclusion. I have agreed 10 minutes with the Minister.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): You have been speaking for 20 minutes.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Olner.

Although no formal good laboratory practice protocols existed in the early '70s, it is quite clear that Searle's scientists breached even the most basic understanding of sound laboratory science. However, the real tragedy is that it was on those 15 deeply flawed studies that the final decision to approve aspartame in the US was made, and many other countries soon followed suit. Today, those same highly questionable studies still underpin the science attesting to aspartame's safety.

Aspartame's approval incorporates not just bad science but bad politics. On the political scene, Donald Rumsfeld was instrumental in securing its approval. As chief executive officer of Searle from 1977, he publicly pledged to call in his markers to get it approved. Despite a public board of inquiry reopening the case in 1979 and ruling unanimously against its approval, Rumsfeld appears to have honoured his pledge.

When Ronald Reagan was inaugurated as President in 1981, Donald Rumsfeld was on his transition team. President Reagan sealed the lid on the aspartame controversy. On the very day of his inauguration, Reagan personally wrote the executive order suspending the FDA commissioner's powers on aspartame. Reagan replaced the commissioner one month later with Arthur Hayes Jr., who granted the official licence for aspartame. The history of its approval is littered with examples showing that if key decision-makers found against its safety, they were discredited, ignored or replaced by industry sympathisers, who were in turn recompensed with lucrative jobs.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): I must ask the hon. Gentleman now to conclude.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Mr. Olner.

I have raised some of the most important questions about aspartame's safety ever discussed in this place. There is solid evidence to suggest that its regular long-term use can cause cancer and a range of other health problems. Emergency action is now needed to remove the toxin from our own and our children's diets. Aspartame has caused concern among the public and the scientific community for more than 30 years. Better information or better product labelling simply is not enough at this point. Today, I am giving the Government a chance to set right what previous British, European and international health authorities have so dismally failed to do. A total ban is the only way to protect the British public.

4.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I welcome the debate secured by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams). He obviously feels passionately about this issue. He cited a number of scientists and experts who have a particular view about aspartame. I will go through the procedures that we have in the European Union, which are outside whatever the United States does, for confirming and granting the status and use of additives in our foods, and I will discuss safety in the food chain in relation to the issue. This is not a status quo issue; as any new evidence comes forward, it is important that all these issues are examined afresh. I link to that the latest study to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

I will give an overview. We take the safe use of artificial sweeteners and all additives in food seriously. We are all aware that food additives may be added to food, usually at very low concentrations, for a variety of reasons. Those include restoring colours lost during processing, providing sweetness in low sugar products and preventing deterioration during storage. As the Minister with responsibility for public health, I am always advocating that people have a healthy diet, which I hope would include more of the fresh foodstuffs that are available in our stores. That is why we support the five-a-day programme.

The use of artificial sweeteners can be beneficial, particularly for those who seek a low calorie alternative to a certain food. That is especially true given our current debate on how we tackle the increasing problem of obesity in this country. Despite that, the important issue is consumer safety, regardless of whether the additive comes from a natural source or is man made. The question of safety is central to the decision as to whether or not an additive should be permitted in our food.

The use of food additives is strictly controlled by laws that are negotiated at European level, which list those additives that are approved for food use, the types of food in which the additives may be used and the maximum amounts that may be used. Before an additive is approved it must go through an extensive safety evaluation undertaken by independent experts. In the EU, that is now carried out by the independent scientific committees that advise the European Food Safety Authority. The manufacturer of the additive must submit a detailed dossier of research into the safety of that substance in order for it to be evaluated. That research must include toxicological tests to determine whether the substance is harmful. Such tests are designed to give information on any possible effects of exposure to the additive, including whether it may have any potential to cause cancer.

As far as I am advised, aspartame is not known to cause cancer in humans and the evidence does not indicate the potential for it to do so. Most studies in animals showed that it did not cause cancer. It is important for experts to examine the data to see why the Ramazzini study is different. I will come to that matter later and go into more detail.

I shall say something about the difference between aspartame and Sudan 1. Sudan 1 is an industrial dye that has never been approved for use in food and its presence in food is therefore illegal. When it became clear that the substance was being used in foodstuffs—Worcester sauce is one example—we had to act quickly to take those substances off the market. The data from the scientific literature suggest that Sudan 1 is genotoxic in that it damages DNA, but there is no suggestion that aspartame is genotoxic. I make that clear because Sudan 1 should never have been in food products.

The applicant has to justify the technological need for the additive; the process of evaluation can often take years before safety can be assured and even after approval it will be subject to continued monitoring. I am sure the Committee agrees that that is absolutely right.

We need to ensure that consumers can make choices about the foods they eat and European Community labelling regulations require the additive to appear clearly in the ingredient list on food labels. It must be identified by one of a number of category names specified in the regulations, such as sweetener or colour, followed either by the specific name of the additive or by its E number.

Aspartame has been used in soft drinks and other low-calorie or sugar-free foods throughout the world for more than 25 years. Questions have been asked about the safety of the product and I shall outline the conclusions that have been drawn from the large body of research investigating its safety.

In 2001, the Food Standards Agency pressed the European Commission to revisit its previous safety assessment of aspartame published in 1988. As a result of that request, the European Commission's independent Scientific Committee on Food reviewed more than 500 research papers published in the scientific literature between 1988 and 2001 on the safety of the product. The papers included studies that considered the toxicity of the substance, and the research was conducted by independent researchers. The SCF also took into account the outcome of a review published in 2002 of the safety of aspartame, which was carried out by the French Agency for Food, Health and Safety. The review by that agency concluded that there was no evidence of a link between the consumption of aspartame and the development of brain tumours. Following that extensive exercise in December 2002, the SCF concluded that there was no evidence to suggest the need to revise the conclusion previously drawn by the committee that aspartame was safe for use in food.

More recently, in July this year, Worcester at the Ramazzini Foundation in Italy published the findings of new research on the safety of aspartame, suggesting that rats may develop tumours when given doses of aspartame equivalent to the acceptable daily intake amount for humans. However, I understand from the study that the full data have yet to be published and the UK's independent committee on the carcinogenicity of chemicals in foods has reviewed initial data from the study published in July. At this stage they are not convinced by the Worcester interpretation of the data.

However, the Committee agreed that the full data set should be reviewed, and that will be carried out by the European Food Safety Authority. Of course, the findings from the study will need to be considered in the light of the extensive body of existing data on the safety of aspartame. I hope that reassures the hon. Gentleman that we are also open to any new evidence that comes to light but it is important that the full evidence is explored and examined.

The researchers from the Italian institute have been asked to make available all the data from the study in order for the assessment to be carried out. When we have advice from the European Food Safety Authority, the Food Standards Agency and its independent scientific advisory committees will study EFSA's opinion carefully and consider whether it needs to revise its advice on consuming aspartame. The current advice from the Food Standards Agency remains in place, namely that aspartame is safe for use in food.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned methanol and formaldehyde. Those substances are naturally present in the body and, as far as I understand, studies have shown that they are not increased by aspartame. Those substances are toxic at high doses, but not at the levels released from aspartame.

I understand that the hon. Gentleman has asked the Food Standards Agency for information to assist him in his investigations. I hope that he agrees that the FSA and its officials have tried to respond in good faith and in a transparent way with the information that he has asked for. That includes information on how scientists and others developed the acceptable daily intake, or ADI, for aspartame.

As I understand it, the intakes are defined for both adults and children, and are set at a very conservative, low level to cover the maximum levels that people might consume. As part of that work, issues were explored, particularly to do with children, the sort of food and drink products that they might use, and the maximum amount of foods containing aspartame that they might consume in a day. That was cross-referenced with the levels of aspartame that children might acquire if they really went all out to consume as many products containing aspartame as possible. When that was done, the study showed that that was still below the accepted daily maximum level.

I recognise the concerns raised in this debate, and I hope that I have assured the hon. Gentleman that we take the issue seriously. Our procedure in the European Union is to continue to keep an open mind about any new evidence that comes forward. However, we should not lose sight of the fact that additives are approved only if they are of benefit to consumers and are shown to be safe at the levels used in foods.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at three minutes to Five o'clock.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Roy.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): I welcome the opportunity to debate the Science and Technology Committee's 10th report of Session 2003–04, "Scientific Publications: Free for all?"

I am delighted that the former Chairman of the Committee, the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), is present. I want to put on record my thanks and that of the Committee for all the work that the hon. Gentlemen did on this report. We shall see by the end of the debate whether the people in the Gallery think that his work on this report is noteworthy. I am also delighted that other former members of the Committee are here to debate the report.

I confess that the market for scientific journals did not feature prominently either in my postbag or on my radar before I became the Chairman of the Committee. It soon did. Of all the issues that I have been involved with in the past six months, this is the one that has created the most heat, and sometimes the most light. I hope that there will be more light than heat today.

I have been staggered at the level of interest and the intensity of feeling on the subject, which tends to divide both the academic and publishing communities and which sees Ministers running for cover, although I hope that that will not be the case today.

Only last week, 40 fellows of the Royal Society, which is not noted for its protests, wrote to protest at the position that the Royal Society had recently adopted on open access publishing. My task is to put the issue of scientific publications into context, to provide an overview of what the Committee's report did and did not say, to trace significant developments since the Committee reported and the Government replied, and to ask the Minister where we go next.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his position as Chairman of this important Committee. Can he put scientific publications in context? Scientific publications will not be top of everyone's agenda this Christmas, but it is an important subject, especially in an increasingly globalised world. There is growing recognition that we all share problems and that we must ensure that the poorer countries in particular have access to the world's scientific database so that they can respond appropriately to problems that must be tackled, such as major natural disasters, avian flu, AIDS and malaria. Scientific publications may not be at the forefront of Radio 4's political agenda at present, but it is a very important issue, and I congratulate the previous Committee Chairman on adopting it as an inquiry.

Mr. Willis: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind comments. I echo everything that he said. I hope that my remarks will indicate that, although I came to the topic fairly new, I understand its seriousness and why it interests so many people in the scientific and publishing communities. I hear strongly the words he says about third world science.

All Committee members who are present are grateful for the briefings that they received from various learned societies, such as Research Councils UK, to prepare for the debate. The Committee launched the inquiry in December 2003 for several reasons.

First, there was a recognition that digitisation had led to a transformation in the way in which scientific knowledge is stored and disseminated. The potential for infinitely faster internet access to scientific knowledge was forcing changes to the traditional ways in which scientific publishing operated. In exactly the same way, digital communication is transforming the acquisition and dissemination of knowledge in all areas of society. Web technologies, from blogs to electronic laboratory notebooks, are transforming the way in which the internet is being used. The internet is not just a giant library, as many people think; it is increasingly used in many scientific establishments as a collaborative laboratory.

The second reason was that the open access movement was just beginning to gather momentum in 2003. When I use the term "open access", I refer to two basic strands: self-archiving by authors in institutional repositories and the "author pays" model, with which authors or their funders pay for the cost of publishing their work in peer-reviewed journals that are then disseminated for free. When I talk about open access in this debate, I am referring in broad terms to the principle that the published output of research should be available to everyone without charge.

The third reason why the Committee went into this subject was that libraries had begun to complain that they were struggling to meet the cost of providing the journals that they needed for their students, including research fellows and post-doctorate students. The average price of academic journals rose by 58 per cent. between 1998 and 2003, compared with the UK retail prices index increase of 11 per cent. Libraries were concerned by some of the policies of the major publishers, such as big deals and bundling—whereby they are required to accept the whole output of the publisher rather than being able to pick titles—and wanted to take co-ordinated action.

The fourth reason was that increased attention was being drawn to the profits of the scientific, technical and medical publishers, which appeared to the Committee to be excessively high. Reed Elsevier told the Committee that it made an operating profit of 34 per cent. on its scientific publications, with profits amounting to 17 per cent. after tax. The Committee was rightly concerned that too high a proportion of the financial benefits from the Government's substantial investment in research was ending up with publishers' shareholders.

[Mr. Willis]

The Committee's inquiry attracted over 120 written evidence submissions, and there were four well-attended oral sessions. Indeed, on two occasions a larger room had to be hired to get everyone in.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): Hired?

Mr. Willis: Well, they come for free; unlike in Oxford, where nothing is free.

The report, which was published in July 2004, received praise and criticism in almost equal measure for things that it did and did not say. Let me try to dispel a few myths by outlining what were, for me, some of the key recommendations. First, the Committee expressed support for institutional digital repositories with its recommendation that research councils and other Government funders should mandate the researchers who they fund to deposit a copy of their articles in an institutional repository within a reasonable period from the time of publication so that researchers would be able to research all UK-based repositories from one single site, with the Government acting as an advocate of those repositories at a global level in order to maximise their benefits.

The second key recommendation was that the Government should support further experimentation with the author pays publishing model by, for example, making available a portion of research council grants for authors to experiment in that way. It also recommended that the Government should conduct research into the viability of that model, particularly into whether some of the unresolved problems with it can be overcome.

A key justification for those recommendations—for me, one of the most compelling arguments for greater involvement with open access recommendations—was the potential for developing countries, which the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) mentioned. Institutions in many developing countries cannot hope to keep their researchers up to date with all relevant research by paying the necessary subscriptions. Free access on a global scale has huge attractions for the third world. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) wants to address that issue later.

It is fair to say that the Government's response was curious. The hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) said so in press releases, though his language was perhaps more graphic than describing it as interesting. The report did not recommend the immediate and wholesale transition to the author pays model, but that appears to have been the common misconception, not least in the Government. Indeed, in a commentary in The Guardian of 9 November 2004 about the Government's response Richard Wray wrote:

"The government is, of course, within its rights to ignore select committees, but it could at least have properly read the report".

I think that that Committee did feel that the report had not been read properly.

The Government's response of October 2004 seemed to argue against and reject the author pays model as if it was what the Committee proposed, when it palpably was not. In fact, the Committee report highlighted some problems with that model. One was the free-rider issue—the prospect of industry gaining free access to journals for which it currently pays. Another was the impact on learned societies that derive a significant proportion of their income from publishing journals that would be threatened by the new model. The rigour of peer review in the new model was unproven and there was also a question of the financial disadvantage that the UK would suffer internationally by making a unilateral commitment to the author pays model without getting international agreement. The Committee accepted that all those issues needed to be dealt with before any massive roll-out of and investment in the free access proposals.

The Government's response was also negative in that it did nothing to support or co-ordinate the establishment of institutional repositories. The Government did not oppose them in principle and on page 27 of the 14th report it is noted that they recognised them as "a significant development worthy of encouragement".

However, rather than take a co-ordinating role as the Committee suggested, the Government preferred to leave it to each institution to make its own decisions. Of course the recommendation relies on some central guidance. A laissez-faire approach, in which individual institutions have their own repositories, with no co-ordination, was a recipe that would not take us much further. Few authors, certainly, would be prepared to participate. By doing nothing the Government effectively rejected a key recommendation.

An even more remarkable feature of the Government's response was their complacency about the state of scientific publishing in the UK. Their policy of amounted to non-intervention in a market that many complained was already tilted against libraries and in favour of the major scientific publishers. It was that complacent response from the Government that prompted the Committee to take the relatively unusual step of publishing the Government's response with further comments in the 14th report of the 2003–04 Session, published in November 2004. The Committee was not unduly concerned that the Government had rejected the thrust of the recommendations. There is nothing new in that, as I am sure you would vouch, Mrs. Dean. It was the way in which the response had been assembled that caused concern.

"facilitating a level playing field"

Of course many different arms of Government fed into the response; the Department of Trade and Industry, the Office of Science and Technology, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education and Skills all had an interest. However, certain key voices seemed to be ignored, particularly that of the joint information systems committee, the Government-funded advisory body responsible for providing leadership in the innovative use of information and communications technology to support education and research. That very body, which should have been at the heart of the response, was initially left out. Indeed, the impression was given to the Committee that the voice of the DTI had overridden the advice of the relevant advisory bodies such as the joint information systems committee. It appeared to many that the DTI had done a good job of defending the interests of the successful UK publishing industry at the expense of innovation in the market that might benefit the wider academic community.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government's response was highly coloured by the previous Office of Fair Trading report and that they probably adopted their wait-and-see attitude because the European Commission has also undertaken an investigation into the matter?

Mr. Willis: I am grateful for that remark. It is quite clear that the Department of Trade and Industry was somehow leant on for it to have produced such an ambivalent response to the Committee's report. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is right about the European connection, but perhaps I shall leave him to further his argument when he makes his comments later.

In the context of our current inquiry into scientific advice to Government, into evidence-based policy making, and into how the process works in practice, it is interesting to note that this episode is not a great example of the way in which the Government take advice and use it to formulate policy. Perhaps it will make a good case study.

Bob Spink: While the hon. Gentleman is talking about the Government's response to the inquiry, would he care to comment on what the Government did not say in their response? They did not, for example, offer to remove VAT on the provision of electronic versions of printed works, or offer any help at all to set up a national site licence arrangement for the UK, which would benefit higher education institutions and, quite possibly, further educational establishments and libraries.

Mr. Willis: Having got into the whole subject late, and having read the evidence that has been made available, I am more and more confused about why the Government responded as they did. They failed to address the report's core recommendations, but they also failed to seize the opportunity to consider the wider issues such as publishing and the way in which universities gain access to information. I was particularly concerned about the way in which the repositories issue was swept under the table, as dealing with it would have addressed many of the issues that the hon. Gentleman has just mentioned.

In their next response, the Government denied seeking to neutralise the views of JISC, as we would expect. Again, the response referred to not wanting to force a premature transition to an author pays model, as if that was what was being asked for in the first place. The recommendation was actively to explore the possibility of a new model by gathering and analysing evidence, not to express immediate support. The Government did, however, undertake to consider all the evidence as it became available, including the results of some experiments and initiatives that are currently under way. That is a welcome commitment to evidence-based policy making. We will see what it means in practice when the Minister responds later this afternoon.

Although the Government were unwilling to make any commitment to open access publishing, other key players were responding to what they saw as a very important issue. In November 2004, the Wellcome Trust announced a new policy and a significant step towards an open access environment. It plans to establish UK PubMed Central, a new repository for biomedical research similar to the existing PubMed Central in the United States.

The process of establishment will begin early next year. Under the new policy, researchers funded by Wellcome are required from 1 October 2005 to deposit an electronic copy of their peer-reviewed articles that are accepted for publication in PubMed Central, which will be UK PubMed Central when it is established, within six months of publication. The trust will fund all costs associated with that move.

In February 2005, the National Institutes of Health in the US announced a new policy, under which its funded researchers will have to deposit a copy of all their published papers on a central archive that is managed by the National Library of Medicine within 12 months of publication.

A recent Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development study found evidence of a shift towards direct access to primary data sources that was having a significant impact on scientific publishers, many of whom have invested heavily in online publishing. The study anticipated a period of experimentation using different types of open access models, but concluded that national and international co-ordination was required to broaden access to data from publicly funded research and to contribute to the advancement of scientific research and innovation.

In short, the open access movement is progressing and is fast becoming a serious option in the field of scientific publications. Unsurprisingly, a slightly different picture emerges if one talks to the publishers. Reed Elsevier, the largest scientific publisher in the UK, which publishes more than 1,800 journals and 2,200 new books each year, claims that the number of new open access journals peaked in 2001 and has since declined. It described 41 per cent. of them as loss-making; it must have been talking to Lord Sainsbury, because he told the Committee exactly the same thing on 19 October, when he said that "we have seen a peak in the enthusiasm for open access publishing and a fall-off in people putting forward proposals for it".

It is not clear what he means by a peak. Does he mean that the number of open-access journals is declining or simply that the rate of increase has slowed since 2001? I should be grateful if the Minister addressed this specific issue. Do the Government still believe that open access publishing is in decline or is it on the increase?

The publishers raise a serious point, which needs to be addressed; is there a need to duplicate what already exists? They have taken steps to improve access to their own publications, and several pilots are already running. For example, CrossRef, is running a pilot involving 45 publishers, in partnership with Google, to determine the value to the scholarly community of a free inter-disciplinary, inter-publisher search of peer-reviewed scholarly literature.

Publishers would argue that access is not a problem. Reed Elsevier says that 90 per cent. of all UK researchers now have access to more than 95 per cent. of its articles, although only if they subscribe, and they will not get access otherwise. There is no doubt that publishers are investing considerable sums in improving the accessibility of their material and maintaining it on a database. In that respect, there are real questions for the Minister to answer. Should public money be spent on establishing a similar facility through institutional repositories? Is he concerned about duplication?

The evolution of open access is taking place almost as we speak. I am sure that this is pure coincidence, but it was announced only this morning that three major publishers—Blackwell, Oxford University Press and Springer—will ensure that research published in their journals is immediately made available online without charge to the reader. The costs are being met by research funding bodies. That seems a significant development, and I hope that the Minister will comment on it. Does he stick to the Science Minister's view that the open access movement has peaked or does he see such moves by publishers as evidence of a growing trend? If so, what are the implications for Government policy? At what point do the Government embrace the new model and plan accordingly?

Of course, the most significant player in determining a shift in thinking on open access is the RCUK, which has been consulting on the issue since the summer. Under its proposal, researchers would be allowed to continue choosing where best to publish their research. However, the RCUK proposal would also introduce a requirement that "subject to copyright and licensing arrangements, a copy of any resultant published journal articles or conference proceedings should be deposited in an appropriate e-print repository ... wherever such a repository is available to the award-holder."

Even the most ardent open access supporter would agree that there might be different time lags for different disciplines, but the need for access to the latest research in mediaeval history is not quite as acute as it is in the field of, say, genetics.

The RCUK's proposal also states that councils would agree to applicants including the predicted costs of publishing in an author pays journal in their grant applications, subject to the justification of cost-effectiveness. That could be a significant development, although I say "could" because it is unclear whether the RCUK remains supportive of that proposal.

The RCUK's proposal would affect the 15,000 academics who are in receipt of a research council grant at any one time and whose work represents 60 per cent. of research findings in the UK. It also goes a long way towards implementing the recommendations in the Select Committee's original report. Importantly, it is also supported in broad terms by Universities UK, although that body, too, flags up one or two issues that need resolving. However, it has to be accepted that if the research councils are going to pay for researchers who want to publish in author pays journals, a considerable shift will have to take place because money that would normally go towards research will be going towards publication costs instead. Can the Minister tell us whether that is still envisaged? If so, what would he regard as the consequences for research council budgets?

Dr. Evan Harris: Does my hon. Friend accept that in those circumstances, provided that there was a shift to author pays and the funding for it was substantial, one might expect savings in library budgets? Many higher education institutions are Government-funded, and it should not be beyond the wit of Government to track the flow and make the budgetary adjustments necessary to diminish the impact on budgets of such a move.

Mr. Willis: One of the confusing things about the Government's two responses to the original report and the Committee's response to the Government's response to the original report is that they have not grasped those issues. They need to consider what research is needed in order to verify a cost base for this type of publishing. To be fair to both the publishing houses and the learned societies, that cannot happen until one does an analysis and makes comparisons with some of the models in the United States, where it is free to publish and free to access, and the whole system is underpinned either by grants or by donations. We need a commercial model that stacks up against the existing system. That can be achieved only by means of trials and proper research. The lack of research and of engagement with the issue is a worry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner) indicated dissent.

Mr. Willis: Perhaps the Minister, who is shaking his head, will come up with some superb ideas before the end of the afternoon. I am sure that that will make my hon. Friend very pleased.

Not surprisingly, there is some opposition. The moves by Wellcome, the RCUK and others continue to be largely opposed by those involved in publishing. The Royal Society supports the principles that underlie the proposals, but not the policy. It is concerned that mandated self-archiving will threaten to undermine established methods; in particular, it notes that many learned societies can conduct their full ranges of activities only through the profits that they currently make from publishing. It also reports concerns in the community that biomedicine might lend itself more readily to open access publishing than other disciplines such as mathematics, chemistry and physics, although that position was attacked last week by 40 fellows of the Royal Society.

It would be wrong to characterise the concerns of the learned societies as simply preserving vested interests. I certainly would not want to say that. The learned societies are not-for-profit organisations, whose very reason for being is the promotion of scientific research in their respective communities and the dissemination of the results of that research to the public. Some, though not all, of them are heavily reliant on income from their publications. If there is a move to an author pays model, the affected learned societies will have either to find an alternative income stream or scale down their activities. We need to consider the issue, and the position of the learned societies very carefully before there is a wholesale change.

Reed Elsevier also supports in principle the aims of the RCUK proposals, but describes the results of their implementation as "chaotic, costly and detrimental for British research."

Institutional repositories are opposed on the grounds that they provide an unnecessary parallel distribution channel for published journal articles and Reed Elsevier also says that it would destroy the publishing system whose output the RCUK seeks. I hope that other hon. Members will address all these real issues and concerns head on.

The matter of copyright also needs to be resolved. Traditionally, publishers have looked after the copyright on behalf of authors, and few authors have complained—they have not noted any significant problem with that arrangement. The Committee viewed the issue as being crucial to the success of self-archiving, and the Government have expressed support for a flexible approach to copyright. Can the Minister give us a general update on that work? The RCUK initiative is significant because it will be viewed, to some extent, as that body flexing its muscles and testing how much room for manoeuvre it is being allowed by the Government.

The DTI has been thought to be lukewarm, at best, on the proposal. That was confirmed when the Minister, Lord Sainsbury, last appeared before the Committee in October when he told us that the policy required some further development. He asked RCUK to go back and negotiate with publishers on timing, rather than leaving that matter to individual researchers. I hope that the Minister will be able to update hon. Members on the progress of those negotiations, and to tell us how closely the DTI has been involved. Is Lord Sainsbury breathing down the neck of the RCUK at the negotiating table, or does it have a free hand?

It would be wrong for me to paint a picture of conflict in the world of scientific publishing. There are many encouraging moves by both traditionalists and open access enthusiasts to find the most effective way of getting high-quality scientific research published. The RCUK and the Royal Society, with the collaboration of publishers, have set up a study to examine the impact that self-publishing and self-archiving will have. That study will take place over the next two years, by which time the impact of the RCUK proposals may start to be felt. I welcome that study and I am sure that the Committee does too. That will go some way towards establishing an evidence base on which Government and funders of research can make further decisions. It is a great pity that the Government did not commit to such a move in their initial response to the Select Committee report.

Publishers are also responding to demands for greater access and for allowing authors greater scope to submit their articles to repositories or publish them on a website. I understand that some learned societies are conducting their own limited experiments with different publishing models, and other hon. Members will refer to those later. However, I and former members of the Science and Technology Committee remain to be convinced that the Government have made a serious effort to get all the key players together to discuss the development of this policy. I understand that the DTI has recently established a research communications forum, and I would like to ask the Minister for further details about who is involved in that and what he is seeking to achieve.

This is a complex and rapidly evolving market involving many interests that share common aims but are often in sharp conflict over delivery. The Government, with all their different internal interests, must establish their priorities. It seems bizarre that the Government are pumping very large sums into research, but should be content to leave the market to determine how that publicly funded research is disseminated.

The Government have wisely identified scientific research as the key driver of economic prosperity. If the pace of research is accelerated significantly by the rapid and universal access to research findings, surely the Government have a responsibility to pursue that and to maximise the return on the investment in science at an international level, even if that has some impact on some other commercial interests in the UK.

If one method or other demonstrably serves the interests of the UK and the worldwide research community better, the Government might be faced with a decision. In simple terms, do the Government seek to protect the interests of the highly successful publishing industry and the position of some learned societies over and above any potential gains to the scientific community and to the economy as a whole? The Office of Science and Technology may be a small part of the DTI, but is this a case of the tail wagging the dog? We are not yet at the stage when decisions can be reached.

The open access model has many weaknesses, but they should be explored rather than used to dismiss the case at this early stage. The Government should take a lead in gathering the evidence, supporting experimentation, and evaluating the evidence to see what works and what does not.

On institutional repositories, I am inclined to disagree with Lord Sainsbury, who sees a role for them only in rather specific circumstances. My instinct is that if it is worth doing, it should be done properly in a co-ordinated and well-regulated manner. To have real value, it must be comprehensive; all articles must be available, with minimal constraints. The publishers are absolutely right that an unreliable and half-hearted network would be pointless. The Government should take a lead, especially as the financial costs are likely to be minimal, and this is one policy area in which a little bit of boldness would not go amiss. We await developments, and also wait to see whether this is the beginning of a breakthrough in evidence-based policy.

3.5 pm

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): It is a pleasure to be speaking under your chairmanship, Mrs. Dean; I hope that you will keep me in order if I move off the subject. It was a delight to chair the inquiry, among hundreds of others, and I congratulate the members of the Committee on all the hard work that they put into it. I also congratulate the people who helped, including the Clerks. I want to mention one in particular; a young woman called Emily Commander, who was brilliant in terms of her penetration of the field.

The Committee not only went to meetings of librarians, but into the depths of the City of London to meet venture capitalists who were rather worried about the possible implications for the publishing industry. That demonstrates the importance of this subject, which to most people is dull, boring and irrelevant. It is certainly not the kind of thing that one would find football fans talking about in terms of three-five-two systems or whether Alex Ferguson has gone a bit wonky at the top; like some politicians, I might add. I also congratulate the new Chairman of the Committee; I hope that he can now spend some time worrying about the leadership in his party, as we all do, of course.

Emily Commander was brilliant in guiding us, in helping us, and in getting the right people together to ask the questions. One could tell by the number of people in the gallery in all our sessions how much interest there was.

I shall briefly say why the subject was so interesting. However, I shall say first that the Committee was not going to be domineering about the matter. It was a new area for us in which we reflected on the problems and how we might address them. Some members of the Committee who had experience of the publishing of academic journals knew how the problems had grown over the years and how, as in most things scientific and technological, the science and technology had moved on faster than regulation and faster than the communication of some of the discoveries that had been made. We considered the explosion of research and the absolute necessity to keep up our citation indexes in the international academic research community, which we do very well. We realised the importance of this issue, dull as it may be to most people.

Getting three or four years' work published and out there for people to read and understand is a magnificent thing. Sometimes that can be a lifetime's work, and enabling people to see and understand it is all part of building our great scientific international community. The work must be accessible to people; not just scholars and academics, but the public.

We know that the public may not want to read chemistry journals—neither do I, in some ways—but sometimes interesting articles are published in publications such as The Lancet, for example on subjects such as MMR, and people want to see for themselves what is being said, rather than what the Daily Mail tells them has been said. It is important that such material be openly accessible to people. It is also interesting to read how the work was done, what was found out, what we do not know, and what we need to know.

Dr. Evan Harris: The hon. Gentleman has made an important point. It is a strange world that we live in, in which what is accessible to the public is that which is not peer reviewed and where, often, the research that is peer reviewed and carefully examined before being published is not available to the public free of charge on the internet. That is the dilemma; it creates real problems for policy makers and for public engagement with science.

Dr. Gibson: I shall come to that point later.

Dr. Iddon: On that very point, is it not important that if scientific information, or any other information, is given on the internet, we need to develop a system such as the kite mark, which is what the Committee recommended, to show whether the paper has been peer reviewed?

Dr. Gibson: I absolutely agree. Peer review is acknowledged to be the best way for people to find out whether something has been reviewed. Many papers get turned down. Prestigious journals turn down between 70 per cent. and 80 per cent. of papers, so it is important to handle that issue.

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) raised a conundrum. The difficulty is that if one goes for an open access system, the likelihood is that papers in this great new future are unlikely to have been peer reviewed. As the former Chairman, can the hon. Gentleman say whether the Committee made any estimate of the number of people who feel that they do not have access to the latest scientific research?

Dr. Gibson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I suspect that most people do not understand what peer review means. They would not know a kite mark from a Chelsea football flag. It is impossible. I would recommend that the Committee thinks seriously about whether the peer review system is right. We have been using the system for a long time, and often serious criticisms are made of it, especially that one's pals referee the papers and allow them to be published. Even under the current system, that makes peer review not all that it might be. We need a proper inquiry into how to prevent falsehoods and bad papers entering the public domain.

An inquiry is important also because policy is now made on evidence-based information, which has become the mantra for major policy decisions; perhaps not entirely, but it is a large feature. How many times have we heard "good science" or "science-based"? I shall not go on about how often such phrases are abused. They are certainly abused by committees in the United States; the Republican party has managed to use them and has perverted information that has been properly reviewed. There is a real problem making evidence available to those who make the excellent policies that we need. We generally pick up such issues; we know what causes AIDS and what causes avian flu. We can learn an awful lot, but it is important that that information be communicated to the scientific community.

Mention has been made of developing countries. During another inquiry, the Committee had an amazing trip to Malawi. We talked to academics and people working in the university system there who would welcome the opportunity of using such information. I note that a document from the Royal Society of Chemistry makes pertinent criticisms that reflect our worries; however, it also says that it would be patronising to give the developing world that sort of information. I can tell the Royal Society that it is patronising to think that the public would not want to access some of its chemical papers, particularly if they are looking to see whether a chemical has side effects on the environment and other such issues.

Mr. Vaizey: I am surprised to hear that the Royal Society of Chemistry has made such remarks. I have been told that many publishers, including not-for-profit publishers, provide research and journals to the third world either freely or heavily subsidised through a variety of programmes.

Dr. Gibson: Yes, that happens, but not to the extent that we would wish. In interacting with the developing world, we are creating a research capacity that will allow them to do things for themselves; we will help build it up, giving grants and so on. That is all part of the process. They have to access the hard information that allows them not only to use those drugs in the best manner, but to have the facilities through which they can understand them. Computers are not restricted to this part of the hemisphere. They are present everywhere and people can access such information through them.

I want to say something about the history of the problem, which did not just come out of the air. I remember looking for hours through the current contents of journals. One would have to comb all the way through them, send off a request to get the papers and then get about 1 per cent. of the papers back, if any at all. It was quite costly. Otherwise, one would have to photocopy and would build up huge photocopying bills in order to get such international information. We can move on from that and, to a large extent, we have. I only say that because that was what it was like for many of us as we grew through the scientific movement and were being trained. I welcome anything that will improve the situation.

The digitisation that is taking place and the role of the British Library are so important. The British Library has more scientific information locked inside it than any other organisation that I know of, apart perhaps from the Vatican. We need to ensure that that information is available to everybody. Many small businesses go to the British Library to get such information. It is a fount of information and we have to encourage that. It is part of the process.

I openly tell the Chamber that the whole inquiry started with me talking to Lord Eatwell in the House of Lords Bar about the problem of the British Library and getting the information out there. From then on, it spread like wildfire. I am pleased that the British Library has welcomed our report on the long-term storage of information.

So, why did we start the inquiry? It was not just about Lord Eatwell buying me a drink in the House of Lords. Some of us knew that some publishers seemed to have a monopoly on a small number of prestige journals. I say "prestige journals" because of an important exercise in universities called the research assessment exercise. Research that is published scores more points if it is published in the right places. Some journals, such as Nature, give high points. They are very expensive and increasing in price. Librarians in universities and other environments—

Dr. Gibson: As I was saying, there is no problem with acknowledging that prestige journals are very important. They will continue. The Committee had no intention of suppressing the publication of data in the form of pamphlets, books or whatever. That point is extremely important. At the same time, it thought that information should be openly available to many more people.

Many librarians told us, and it was the personal experience of some of us, that subscriptions in libraries were decreasing. I know why and what we should be doing about it. More funding is needed, not just through the local university, which has more commitments now, but from central sources. Every year, everyone who worked at a university was given a list of all the publications with the number of people who had accessed them over the last year; they had to pick their favourite. "The Marine Biology of New Zealand" might then disappear from the shelves, which I can understand, but sometimes subscriptions to very prestigious journals were stopped because of the increasing costs.

The only way to handle that is to increase the budget into universities alongside the open access facility to recognise that this dual approach, with open access, is here to stay. More and more people are beginning to get involved in that across the world. It has been gaining momentum and influence. The political message, which is reflected by the Wellcome Trust, is that publicly funded research out of the taxpayers' pocket should be available for the public to see—whether it is complicated chemistry, physics or whatever. Yes, it may be a problem, but many of the other works that are published are there and open for the public who pay for them to see and understand. One cannot talk about openness and transparency without having that facility.

Lots of public money feeds into the scientific publishing process. If we want this literate public, we have to give that facility a real chance to shine and develop. I absolutely agree with the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) that universities should be mandated to self-archive their research papers. I welcome the fact that so many people are doing that now. Institutionally based repositories are being set up. We have to get away from the individual silo mentality. We have regional development agencies. Why do they not set up some kind of network between centres such as Cambridge, Essex, Ipswich and Norwich and so on, so that the costs can be kept down? Why is there no interaction and co-operation at that level?

There is a real opportunity to think out of the box and think of new ways around the competitive environment that has been set up in our higher education system. If we want the knowledge to be generally shared with the world, the universe or whatever, it ought to be available through some kind of site. The Government have a responsibility—the report made that clear—to fund the creation of networker repositories to allow people to access all the UK-based repositories from a single site and to provide that shop-front for UK-based research, which is becoming so important.

[Dr. Gibson]

The amount being put into research means that more research, of all types, will do done in this country, and that research must be openly available. If we do not have a system that allows that, we will get what we had in the past. I remember from my time teaching PhD students that they would never publish their work because they could not be bothered. We must get out of that mentality of students and others at university who think, "What for?" The research assessment exercise, if it has done nothing else—and many of us do not favour it—has sharpened people up to publish things; we must give them the facility to do that, and make them proud of their work, so that more people can get in touch with it.

The author pays publishing model is not one that we say is absolutely correct, and that everybody should operate. All that we ask is that people investigate it, for goodness' sake. That is all we want: it is an opportunity. There has been a vicious campaign suggesting that poor people doing research are going to have to find the money for publication from their own back pockets. We never said that, but we said that it should be part of the research councils' budgets to universities to allow that to happen. If we agree the principle that all publicly funded research should be published in journals and that all access to it should be open, the money for that should be provided. That is a sticking point for Government Departments: they would have to increase the science budget still further. And why not? We have doubled it in the last four years. I remember the debate when we asked for it to be doubled, and the mistake was that we should have asked for it to be quadrupled. More and more, science is playing a major part, and the science journals are playing a part.

The author pays model has its problems, one of which is the free-riders. Pharmaceutical companies publish a lot of stuff, on which people cannot get their hands—many of us fight that on other avenues—but if universities do that, it takes the onus off them to pay for the research. They can use the data in their facility. I do not have a blueprint solution for that, but I know that people need to talk honestly to universities about the matter because they need that science base. How they make a contribution to it is worthy of negotiation. I do not think that it is the job of a Select Committee to go into that kind of detail, but the businesses in existence—and not just those who have carried out the research and have trained—would receive the advantages gained by the research being reported.

We have considered all the problems, because our report realised that we needed to address them. We were saying, "Come on, get together and start to address those problems, and do something about them." There has been a move in the right direction, but not enough of one. I mentioned the rigour of peer review, which certainly needs examination, and we should explore ways of how that is handled in this country.

It has been said that the Government's response was negative—there is nothing new there, as it is their job not to respond immediately. However, whatever a Select Committee does, nobody will ever get any credit for it, believe you me. It will have been the Government's idea first; I have seen it so often. Hon. Members should wait until the human embryology report comes out and the Department of Health comes up with ideas. I bet that we shall be able to take them across to the Select Committee report and say, "That's interesting. I've seen that written up before." That is how it works. There is no harm in that, but as long as the process moves forward, we should all be happy with it.

The attitude that there is no problem was not reflected in our report: there is a problem. There are problems that need seriously to be addressed. When we talked to the librarians' annual conference, they were absolutely over the moon about seeing something done about repositories. If the report does nothing else, it will have awoken people to tackling the question seriously. People have talked about the issues before—there is nothing new there—but I think that the report has helped to focus on those sort of questions. My final word to the Government is, "Come on, get off your knees. If you believe in science, support some of the ideas in this report."

3.40 pm

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in the debate. The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) started by saying that a debate on the future of scientific publishing was unlikely to feature on many people's radars. I wholeheartedly agree; it is an esoteric issue for most, but not for those of us who represent constituencies in Oxfordshire. Scientific publishing is a huge industry in the United Kingdom, and is particularly focused in Oxfordshire. We have Reed Elsevier in the constituency of the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) and publishers such as Blackwell, Macmillan and the Oxford University Press in and around Oxford. For the sake of clarity, I should point out that Nigel Blackwell lives in my constituency and is a patron of my association.

In my constituency, I have Informa, formerly Taylor and Francis, at Milton park in Didcot, and the Commonwealth Agricultural Bureau International, the former Commonwealth agricultural board, based technically in the land of Boris, Henley-upon-Thames, but literally 100 yd beyond my border. Hence I have many constituents employed in the industry. It is estimated that the companies that I have mentioned employ directly some 2,500 people, and if we take into account the freelance designers, editors and printers who are associated with the industry, we could probably say that twice that number depend on scientific publishing in and around Oxfordshire. It is also estimated that the industry generates some £100 million in revenues from overseas. We have in the United Kingdom a world-beating industry. On that basis, the debate should be on everybody's radars and it should feature heavily on the "Today" programme; I hope that it will tomorrow.

The recommendations of the Science and Technology Committee are based on two arguments, both of which were addressed by the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson). The first is a practical one. It is asserted that a small number of powerful publishers are pushing up prices and limiting access, and that cash-starved libraries are no longer able to provide the sort of access to academic research that they used to give. The second is a moral argument and, again, was articulated with a creditable degree of force by the hon. Gentleman. It is said—I wrote this before I heard the hon. Gentleman speaking, but it is almost exactly what he did say—that if the Government, or in other words the taxpayer, is funding the research on which these articles are based, morally it is wrong for companies to make a profit by selling that research and for access to be denied to people simply on the grounds of cost.

I take issue with both of those arguments and with the conclusions of the report. I hasten to add that that is no criticism of Mrs. Commander, the excellent Clerk to the Select Committee, who was also the excellent Clerk on the Consumer Credit Bill on which I was lucky enough to be a small foot soldier. First, I do not accept that the problem lies with the publishers. They have made significant changes to take account of the new technology and to increase access, and I do not accept that there is an access crisis. Secondly, I do not accept that the alternative being proposed—the author pays model and the creation of university repositories—is well thought through. Rather, I think that those alternatives have been pushed forward far too fast, without proper analysis and discussion of the additional problems that they may bring with them.

Dr. Gibson: Will the hon. Gentleman give his interpretation of the events referred to by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) concerning companies that today reflect differently in terms of copyright? Has that anything to do with this debate?

Mr. Vaizey: I am not sure that I understand the intervention, so I shall continue with my remarks and hope that they will cover the hon. Gentleman's question about copyright.

Let me talk briefly about the state of the industry. As I understand it, the scientific, technical and medical publishing industry is well established and highly diverse. There are more than 2,000 publishers worldwide producing more than 1.5 million articles in more than 20,000 journals. Those publishers range from large, international businesses, such as Reed Elsevier and Informa, to well-established companies such as Blackwell and on to not-for-profit but highly prestigious organisations such as the Royal Society, which effectively started scientific publishing.

Mr. Willis: Perhaps I could just help with regard to the question from the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Gibson). The hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) has mentioned Blackwell Publishing twice now, and its president, Mr. Bob Campbell, said today that if customers wanted to pay for open access, publishers should offer them the appropriate services. Is that not really what the Committee's report is asking for? There is a variety of models from which we could choose; it is not just a choice between the publishers' current model and a complete move to open access.

Mr. Vaizey: On that basis, the hon. Gentleman is rapidly moving the debate towards a consensus, because I agree that there should be a variety of models. However, I do not agree that one new model should be imposed on top of the old one or that the Government should somehow have to intervene to ensure that the new model gains ground; the market in scientific research will do that, and I shall explain later how I think that that will happen.

As I said earlier, if we are to understand the importance of scientific research publishing in the United Kingdom, it is important to realise that this country publishes about half of all commercial journals, about 5,000 in all. It is also important to understand that there has been huge growth in the scientific publishing industry in the past few years, which means that much more scientific research is available to many more people. For example, the average library stocks 6,500 titles, as opposed to 4,000 just a decade ago, in the mid-1990s. The average number of articles read by academic researchers has increased from about 150 a year to well over 200 a year today.

City university commissioned a survey of 4,000 academics in 97 countries, and I am sure that hon. Members are fully aware of it. Three quarters of the academics who responded said that they had better access to journals than they did five years ago. According to a briefing that I have seen from Reed Elsevier, 90 per cent. of UK researchers now have access to 100 per cent. of its journals. Just 5 million Reed Elsevier articles were downloaded in 2001, but 25 million are now downloaded every year. My first assertion, therefore, is that, far from declining, access to scientific research is actually increasing.

Furthermore, commercial and not-for-profit companies recognise their responsibilities to the developing world, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon will have more to say on that. Many companies work through schemes such as the programme for the enhancement of research information and with organisations such as the International Network for the Availability of Scientific Publications, the Health InterNetwork Access to Research Initiative and Access to Global Online Research in Agriculture to provide free or low-cost access to journals. If none of that work were being done, the moral case for open access would be far stronger. However, I have been to CABI and seen the CD-ROMs that it produces and makes available at very low cost to the developing world. They are extremely useful to not only academic researchers, but farmers growing crops in the third world. We should recognise the commitment that scientific publishers are making to the developing world.

Overall, therefore, publishers are doubling access to scientific journals every year, the cost per head of using articles is falling, the cost of subscriptions is falling and publishers are increasing output. However, they are not profiteering, because their profit margins remain broadly the same.

On the moral point that all research is funded by the Government and should therefore be free, I have seen a briefing document from Reed Elsevier saying that €89 million a year is paid in subscriptions, but only €2.7 million a year relates directly to research published on the basis of Government research, about 3 per cent. of the total.

Dr. Evan Harris: I am a little confused by the term "Government research". Does the hon. Gentleman mean publicly funded research or research done by Departments?

Mr. Vaizey: It means Research Councils UK research, not specifically departmental research.

Furthermore, one third of all journals are published by not-for-profit organisations, which as hon. Members know, plough all their profits back into research, effectively subsidising Government research. Again, CABI is a good example of that. The organisation publishes 16 journals at a cost of £1.5 million a year and ploughs all profits back into further research.

My assertion is that there is no access crisis and no profiteering. We get value for money and benefit from the subsidies that the publishing industry provides to the developing world and to research. We have a thriving, world-beating, innovative and diverse industry. It is not complacent or tilted against public libraries. It is not waiting to see how things develop, but is pushing forward.

The alternative model is author pays and institutional repositories. It is untried and untested, although I acknowledge that, as the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough said, it is fast gaining ground. I applaud that. I certainly would applaud models that entailed greater open access. I should like to see how they would develop and I should like them to develop from the ground up, not as part of a top-down, Government-sponsored plan. The current model, the peer review model, has been around for 340 years. It is well established and well developed and we do not want to throw out the baby with the bathwater.

Dr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman contrasts the current model, which he calls the peer review model, with the author pays model, which he has twice implied does not involve peer review. Is that his view? Has he been briefed by the publishers to that effect, or has he inadvertently assumed that the author pays arrangement would not and could not include peer review?

Mr. Vaizey: I do not assume that, but I assume that author pays is less likely to involve peer review than the current model. My concerns about the Select Committee's findings are both general and specific. Generally, I have enormous concern, as I have said, about the prospect of the Government suddenly coming up with a top-down model for the universities. That would be a completely wrong-headed way of going about it. For example, I do not know what the cost would be of the Committee's recommendation that we should have a central body to oversee the implementation of repositories. It strikes me as another bureaucratic organisation and another opportunity for the Government to run something when, at the moment, scientific publishing is being run perfectly well by commercial and not-for-profit organisations.

The tone of the report also misrepresents the reason why libraries struggle to meet the cost of journals. What has filtered through to the non-peer-reviewed press, so to speak, is that the fault lies with profiteering publishers. In fact, as I shall explain, it is partly the fault of the huge boom in research. The feast that researchers are enjoying has also led, potentially, to the famine in access to research.

I shall outline specific reasons why the author pays model will encounter problems, which should be ironed out over time, not in a headlong rush. First, on the author pays model, it is likely that wealthy authors or those based at wealthy institutions are the most likely to get published. It is far less likely that those at poor institutions, or in developing countries, will be published. Secondly, the author pays model could create a conflict of interest. At the moment the relationship is between the publisher and the reader. When the relationship is between the publisher and the author there will, to pick up on the hon. Gentleman's intervention, be a conflict of interest, perhaps without such clear dividing lines.

Thirdly, part of the title of the Select Committee report, "Free for all?" is highly misleading. Publishing scientific research is not free. Huge costs are involved for items such as peer review, proof reading and cross-referencing. At the moment it costs about $3,500 to publish the average scientific article. There is no evidence that those costs would decline and if they did I suspect it would lead to a reduction in the quality of the articles. The internet and digitisation provide a fantastically important new platform for the dissemination of research, but nothing can get us away from the fact that making that research ready for publication still involves significant upfront costs, which will not go away.

Dr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman talks about the title. Can I ask him whether he has seen the question mark at the end of the expression, "Free for all?", and whether he understands that that sometimes lends some irony to a statement? In other words, it might not be free.

Mr. Vaizey: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for accepting the point that the publishing of scientific research will always cost money. That is an essential part of this debate. As for his earlier intervention, I believe that the author pays model severely undermines the prospect of peer review. How can the advocates of change guarantee that we will not rapidly move to a model of who pays most gets published fastest? If there is a free-for-all, how can we monitor the quality of contributions as we do now, both by peer review and by the quality of journals in which they are published? The new model will not simply reduce the costs of disseminating scientific research to the benefit of the research community; it will transfer those costs somewhere else within the scientific community.

Dr. Gibson: Under the current system, authors must pay for certain parts of a paper—for example, if it contains a plate or a colour picture. That can be very expensive and one often must get a charity or someone else to pay for it. Therefore, there is already a restriction on authors. It can be quite expensive to publish a paper.

Mr. Vaizey: It certainly can be expensive to publish a paper. However, I do not want a system that transfers that expense wholesale. That is why we all agree that there should be diverse publishing systems and models. We should not rush headlong into a situation in which author pays is the mainstream norm.

The new model will simply transfer costs because while universities and their libraries must currently pay for access to journals, in future they will have to pay for their authors to get published. That means that the cost will fall most heavily on leading universities, many of which are in the UK. Cornell university in New York has already stated that it would see its expenditure rise significantly under an author pays model.

The author pays model is not a panacea or a scientific nirvana. It brings with it some very significant problems. In the UK, there is a particular need to address this issue. In his closing remarks, the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough said that the choice was between protecting the interests of the UK scientific industry or the interests of the research community as a whole. That is a false dichotomy. Potentially, those interests are one and the same. The Government's role is to protect the UK scientific community, not to intervene by, in effect, nationalising research publishing when it is so successful, employs so many people and is such a world-beater.

The real problem is the boom in research. Britain, the developed world and, indeed, the developing world are all putting money into research, which is hugely welcome. However, with the increase in funding for research comes more product. That means fatter journals, more peer review, and more available information. It is estimated that the increase in research and development funding will cause an increase of about 1 million papers a year over the next decade, almost doubling the output. The problem is that library budgets have not kept up with that explosion in information growth.

In searching for a solution to the problem, I ask the Minister to look at the research and development budget in the round, and to think of libraries as part of that budget. That would be a way of saying that research and development is not simply about the creation of knowledge; it is also about its dissemination. If we do not have mechanisms in place to disseminate knowledge, we will all be the poorer.

Britain is recognised as an international centre for journal publishing. I have gone so far as to say that we are a world leader. I believe that, and much of that leadership is based in Oxfordshire. Many of the people who work in that industry live in my constituency. It would be wrong to undermine the industry by a headlong rush into untried and untested models. Instead, we should allow the publishing industry to adapt and to change in the face of that challenge.

The Wellcome Trust initiative is an enormous opportunity, not a threat. The trust is, in effect, a private institution that is perfectly free to set up its own distribution model based on its own charitable principles. I applaud it, not least because it is also a constituent of mine, as it funds the vast majority of the costs of the Diamond synchrotron project at Hull university. That is not the result of a Government solution imposed from above, but a private organisation taking a decision based on its own funding.

As I said, the publishing industry is moving to increase access to its output, and advances are already being made that suggest that an open access system will evolve within the current scenario. Surely it makes sense to allow the system to develop in a viable and sustainable way.

Dr. Gibson: What does the hon. Gentleman think about the RCUK decision on publicly funded research?

Mr. Vaizey: That decision was for the RCUK to take, but I have great concerns about it, not only because wanting to fund international repositories will end up increasing its costs and the cost of access, but because that will have a wider impact on the publishing industry. The RCUK should have thought more carefully before taking that decision.

As the Royal Society says:

"the worst case scenario is that funders could force a rapid change in practice which encourages the introduction of new journals, archives and repositories that cannot be sustained in the long-term but simultaneously forces the closure of existing peer-reviewed journals".

That is the nub of the argument; the problems that arise when people run hell for leather to the new system without any regard to the effect on the current system.

As the chairman of CABI Publishing rightly said to me:

"for information to be freely available, it cannot be available for free".

Distributing knowledge will always cost money, and we must ask whether there is an overwhelming case for the Government to put more money into the distribution of knowledge. In my view, there is no case for the Government to do that.

4.2 pm

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): First, I congratulate you on being elevated to the Chairmen's Panel, Mrs. Dean. It is a pleasure it is to serve under your chairmanship this afternoon.

As a mere northerner, I have always regarded the golden triangle as having all the research. As we have now heard, it also has much of the publishing ability. It was a great privilege to listen to the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey), and I welcome his contribution to the debate.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) said in his introduction that this is a controversial topic. He is, of course, absolutely right, but he ain't seen nothing yet. The previous Committee produced quite a lot of interesting reports, some of which caused controversy, like this one, but we will really see the sparks flying when the subject of human reproductive technologies and the law reaches the Floor of this Chamber or the main Chamber.

I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate on scientific publications, especially in the light of rapid developments and the publication of the Government's response to our report, which has caused some difficulties. Given that I will mention learned societies, I should declare a registered interest in that I am a fellow of the Royal Society of Chemistry and one of its two honorary advisers in the House.

The ideal would be to make all scientific publications available to everyone on the internet at no cost either to the user or to the author, which would, as hon. Members have said, be of enormous benefit to those working in developing countries who do not have access to many of these publications in either hard copy format or in e-publication format because of their excessive costs.

It is the policy of learned societies such as the RSC to make all their publications freely available to those in developing nations, as the hon. Member for Wantage said. Every article published in RSC journals that are more than two subscription years old, but unfortunately dating back only to 1997, is already freely available in digital format. However, the RSC intends to digitalise as far back as it can go. That will cost, however. As hon. Members have said, nothing is for free; somebody must pay for it.

There are those who believe that open access publishing would put at risk the future of learned societies and even commercial publishing houses, especially if neither the user nor the author pays. There is considerable profit to be made from scientific publishing in the commercial field. As has been said, up to half of the world's peer-reviewed journals are published by or on behalf of learned societies and other not-for-profit organisations.

Peer-reviewed journals are much less expensive and are cited more often by other authors than most, but not all, commercial journals. I agree that the publication of journals—with an estimated turnover of £2 billion—contributes significantly to the UK economy. That figure represents 25 to 30 per cent. of the world market. In other words, we are punching well above our weight. Sixty to 80 per cent. of that £2 billion turnover comes from export earnings. The hon. Member for Wantage said that export earnings total £100 million, but I think that the figure is closer to £750 million. Scientific journals are a considerable export earner for the United Kingdom economy.

Some 85 per cent. of the Royal Society of Chemistry's authors and 90 per cent. of its customers live outside the UK. In that case, as in the case of other learned societies, profits are used for several charitable functions. The Royal Society of Chemistry comes second only to the Government in providing educational facilities for chemistry teachers in schools and in higher and further education. The user pays model for journal publications is still by far the most common model used, although many journals charge both for the author to publish and for the user to read a journal. Individual members of learned societies benefit from a considerably cheaper subscription than non-members and libraries, which probably pay the highest subscription cost.

I want to go off-piste for a minute, Mrs. Dean. As a student and teacher in universities for 39 years, I saw many changes in the way in which we published our research findings. Incidentally, I am one of only two scientists who have published as an elected Member of the House of the Commons, the other being a scientist called Roscoe, who did much of his work in Manchester. It took me a long time to persuade the Royal Society of Chemistry to allow me to put MP after my name when I published two or three papers after I was elected in 1997.

When I started to study chemistry seriously in the 1960s, there were few journals to choose from in which to publish. Most were published by learned societies. It was advantageous to become a member of organisations such as the Royal Society of Chemistry because that allowed me to publish free of charge. There were other benefits, too. I began my career by publishing in the Journal of the Chemical Society.

Dr. Gibson: For the record, I published in Nature after I had become an MP. How does that rate in the citation index against the Royal Society of Chemistry publication?

Dr. Iddon: My hon. Friend is trying to get one up on me, because Nature is one of the highest-impact journals. I cannot compete with him. I shall change "two MPs" to "three MPs" in future.

As the number of universities expanded in the UK post-Robbins, and worldwide as well, the number of publications in each subject increased logarithmically. The learned society journals sub-divided and became more specialist. The Journal of the Chemical Society was no exception—it fragmented, too. I started to publish in the Journal of the Chemical Society, Perkin Transactions 1, which was named after Henry Perkin. He discovered mauveine, the first synthetic dye. As the number of publications increased, so the cost to libraries began to rise steeply.

Unfortunately, the learned societies were not moving with the times, and long periods elapsed between submission of a paper and publication. The commercial publishing houses saw the chance and made available journals that not only published rapidly in camera-ready copy, but reduced publication times significantly. That was a huge attraction for scientists to start publishing in commercial rather than learned journals. That was a watershed in the field. Chemists began to publish in journals such as Tetrahedron and Tetrahedron Letters, which are today owned by Reed Elsevier. Library costs soared again. The commercial publishing houses had to make a profit, of course.

The preparation of camera-ready copy was made easier for chemists by the introduction of computer packages that would draw complex molecular formulae and integrate them straight into the text so that the paper could be published direct almost without any alteration. Incidentally, Tetrahedron and Tetrahedron Letters started life at Oxford, at Headington Hill hall, and the gentleman who started those and many other scientific publications—the hon. Member for Wantage is ahead of me, and is smiling—was the great, late entrepreneur, Robert Maxwell. Pergamon press eventually came into the ownership of Reed Elsevier.

A further factor was that the kudos and extra income from being the academic editor of a journal further multiplied the number of journals available from the commercial publishing houses. It seemed that every professor wanted a share of the profits to add to his academic salary because academic salaries were, and always have been, rather poor. In my opinion, academics partly created the problems that we are debating this afternoon. Each journal became more specialised in its coverage. It seemed at one time that there might be a journal for every element in the periodic classification. We had the journals of fluorine chemistry, selenium chemistry, phosphorus chemistry and sulphur chemistry, and it went on and on. Even developing countries started to publish. It became almost impossible for me and many other chemists to keep up with the chemical literature. We had to rely heavily on abstracting services, the most important of which is and was the manual search facility provided by the American Chemical Society in Ohio, Chemical Abstracts. The cost of Chemical Abstracts went through the ceiling. Members have already mentioned the soaring cost of journals. One source has told me that the cost of journals increased by 57 per cent. between 1998 and 2003, just five years.

Along came the Conservative Government in 1979 and higher education, I am sad to say, was starved of money. I remember lists of journals being sent to me on an annual basis by the librarian of the university of Salford, where I worked, and him asking me to put the list in priority order. Every year, journals fell off the bottom of the list at an accelerating rate. That was a sad time.

That is the background that has led to today's debate. One of the greatest changes is access to the world's literature on the worldwide web. It is no longer necessary to dive across the campus, search through the journals on the dusty shelves, find the one wanted and read the paper in often cluttered conditions. The papers can be read at home and at a desk in an office. What a boon that has been to scientists.

Probably the most prolific scientific author of all time happens to be a friend of mine. He is called Professor Alan Katritzky, and he left the university of East Anglia many years ago for the university of Florida at Gainesville. He is such a prolific scientific publisher that his name is in the "Guinness Book of Records". Like me, he is an organic chemist; more specifically we are both heterocyclic organic chemists. In the year 2000, Alan launched a truly open access journal, ARKIVOC for short, or archive for organic chemistry. His motivation was "to alleviate a number of adverse trends in the practise and publication of organic chemistry, which are particularly acute in countries of the second and third world".

Dr. Gibson: I am glad that my hon. Friend has mentioned Professor Katritzky. I knew him quite well and we used to exchange views at meetings. Is it not true that chemists tend to publish every experiment that they do?

Dr. Iddon: That is not true. I will refer to the reasons why in a moment.

To advance their careers, academics compete with each other for a place to publish in the journals with greatest impact—the journals that are most read and most cross-referenced by others in their profession. That drives the cost of those journals higher and higher. The research assessment exercise has not helped with that problem. That sort of competition is most intensive in the science, engineering and technological areas, including the medical sciences.

In the light of those facts, Professor Katritzky launched a not-for-profit organisation called ARKAT-USA Inc. Foundation, which, in January 2000, launched the internet version of the journal to which I have just referred. That was made possible—as I said earlier, nothing is for free—through an initial donation from a benefactor, and it is self-generating today by the generosity of people who want to support it. In the past few months, the innovation has gone one step further, because a hard-copy issue is now available, just at the cost of production—$20 per issue—and it is circulated by the famous internet company, Amazon.

Today, that journal is self-supporting, partly due to the benefactors but also due to the fact that scores of organic chemists contribute towards editing it, peer-reviewing its papers, and providing the technical editorship that is necessary for it to appear in that high quality format. It is a high quality journal; journals will not survive unless they are produced to a high quality, with good peer reviews and with few bad papers in them for that reason.

The author pays online model is growing in acceptability, otherwise we would not be having this debate. However, as has already been pointed out, that loads costs on to funding organisations. The hon. Member for Wantage said that it loads costs on to the authors, but I should like to knock that idea on the head straight away. Very few authors of scientific publications pay out of their own pockets. It is the funding organisations that pay: organisations such as the research councils. However, as the hon. Gentleman implied, it does shift costs away from libraries on to research budgets. Research Councils UK does not appear to have the money to allow that shift to occur. I also doubt that universities will shift costs away from hard-pressed libraries on to equally hard-pressed research departments.

Researchers supported by charities cannot currently meet all the costs of their academic research and so the author pays model is bad for people who use charitable money to carry out their research. There is some controversy about whether that model—the author pays model—is cheaper than the most common subscriber pays model. The Wellcome Trust claims that it is 30 per cent. cheaper, and others agree, but a number of people strongly disagree with that, among which the Royal Society has been mentioned. Of course, wherever money is charged for doing something, there must be quite a number of administrators to collect the money. Therefore, in my opinion, it does not significantly reduce the costs compared with subscriber pays models.

The Government are also not convinced that the author pays model is superior to the current subscriber pays model. They say that they want to provide a level playing field so that market forces can provide a solution to the problem. The Committee, of which I am a member, does not agree with that statement by the Government—I agree with the Committee, and perhaps will explain why later.

The author pays model is probably not acceptable to scientists working in developing countries either, because they will not be able to find the money unless the journal concerned waives the costs. Someone in the debate has already said that that is a rather patronising attitude.

In the past, the costs of hard-copy journals were kept down by the author pays model, but that model still incurs the costs of printing and distribution of the journals, or of setting up and maintaining a website. The higher the rejection rates for papers, the higher the publication costs. Nature Publishing Group rejects some 90 per cent. of the papers submitted to it. That is a phenomenal cost to be loaded on to the publication of that high-impact journal, in which my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) has had the pleasure of publishing. It claims that the author pays model would entail a cost of between £5,500 and £16,500 per article, depending on length. That is a phenomenal publication cost.

[Dr. Iddon]

Some scientists also feel that the author pays model will lower the quality of published papers, especially in commercially produced journals. Obviously, to maximise profits it is in their interest to publish as many papers as possible under that model. That would be a backward step.

Dr. Evan Harris: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman was just making about the potentially high cost, under the author pays system, of publishing a paper where there is a high rejection rate, because of the cost of reviewing and peer reviewing those papers, but would not the problem be solved, to a certain extent, by a charge for submission, which would also deter speculative submissions to high-impact journals by those whose research was not of appropriate quality or whose results were not of appropriate interest?

Dr. Iddon: It would if that approach were universal, but if some journals charged a submission charge and others did not where would an author prefer to publish? The answer is pretty obvious.

Online access to journals would be very welcome to people taking career breaks, such as women who were taking time off to have a child, for example. They could keep up with the literature if they were lucky enough to have a computer at home, or, even if they did not, in the library. That would be an advantage.

The Government's response was wrong. I must reiterate that, because I, too, feel strongly about it. We were not recommending the author pays model in our conclusions. All that we were doing was to suggest to the Government that they should pay attention to it, and perhaps undertake some research and give guidance to publicly funded researchers, so that some indication of the future would be available.

I am pleased to see from today's very welcome Wellcome Trust press release, which was embargoed until today, that the Committee's work has had an impact. The trust will pay for its authors—who are undertaking its research—to publish on three online services: Blackwell Online Open, Oxford University Press's Oxford Open and Springer Open Choice Services. The trust claims that that would cost 1 per cent. of its total annual spend, which seems quite a small amount. Today's announcement has given the open access movement a huge boost and drives the debate a step forward.

The research councils' policy on institutional repositories has been mentioned, and it is one that I welcome, although it has not been finalised. The Committee Chairman and I met Professor Ian Diamond a few days ago, and it is hoped that the details of the policy will be finalised towards the end of spring. The RCUK is about to reach agreements with a large number of commercial publishing houses, which will allow papers published in their commercial journals to go online in institutional repositories.

However, there are difficulties, one of which is the delay. We have not worked out what the delay will be yet, but it will be at least six months, and 12 months for some journals. Of course, commercial publishing houses will allow only the text to be published, which for scientists—such as chemists like me who want to see spectroscopic data—will, frankly, be a severe hindrance. I ask commercial publishing houses to reconsider that policy and allow whole papers, not just the text, to be published online.

It is not only the Wellcome Trust and the RCUK that are involved. The open access movement is worldwide, and one of its big supporters is the National Institutes of Health in the United States. All three organisations have considerable clout in publishing. When the details of the RCUK's policy are announced, it will undoubtedly incentivise academics to deposit research papers in institutional repositories for the benefit of all worldwide. It will also incentivise those universities that have not already done so to set up such repositories. I know that the university of Liverpool has set one up, because I am a visiting professor there.

Institutional repositories will be of benefit only if academics support them and if their funders insist on self-archiving in addition to publication in a reputable journal. In my opinion, they will never replace open access to the journals, particularly the high-impact journals in which everyone wants to be published. However, much research is conducted and published outside the academic environment. As my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North said, the Committee recommended that the British Library be made responsible for operating a central repository.

A third requirement is needed to make institutional repositories successful. All publishers must allow their authors to self-archive in their repositories—without constraint, as I said earlier. Eventually, of course, the repositories will have to be international in scale. That will bring the problem of searching institutional repositories worldwide. Someone has to bite the bullet and provide the search engines. Perhaps it could be Google; perhaps it will be another similar commercial house. At this stage, we do not know.

In answer to my hon. Friend, not all work is published. I know that scores of works still lie unpublished on university library shelves. Indeed, I have one such thesis on my bookshelf; I published a letter, but the full details of the experiments have never been published, and I could not even persuade my research student, who went into industry, to find the time to publish his excellent work. There are scores of unpublished theses throughout the world. I urge universities to deposit them in full in the institutional repositories. That would be a great advantage to science. Theses are littered with negative results, but no journal will publish them. If they are deposited, the negative results arising from hundreds of thousands of experiments will become available. That will help other scientists to avoid repeating those experiments—although when experiments are repeated, they often have different results.

I shall briefly mention VAT. The Committee recommended that the Government consider not charging VAT on e-publications. I challenge the Minister. The Government want a level playing field. They said so to the Committee time after time. How can we have a level playing field if hard-copy publications are zero-rated for VAT and e-publications are rated at 17.5 per cent? The Government say that it is impossible not to charge VAT. Nothing is impossible.

Publishing scientific papers is not only a European problem; it is a worldwide problem. However, VAT is special to Europe. We could raise the issue with the right director general, and try to persuade the European Parliament to zero rate e-publications. Only then will we have a truly level playing field. If that cannot be done, it could be possible to reduce VAT on e-publications to 5 per cent.

The advent of e-publications has brought the world's publishing industry to a watershed. It is likely that more than one publishing model will be available for several years to come before market forces and our academic interests determine the preferred model. Some call for Government intervention and guidance. Indeed, the New Zealand Government have already determined their policy to support the open access movement. Some Governments already support the movement. Others, however, are content to allow the market to determine the future; that is where the Government appear to lie. One thing is for sure, the publishing business is in a state of turmoil. During the transitional period, the cost of accessing scientific publications is likely to rise even more, which will cause many difficulties, particularly for academia and public libraries. I look forward to the Minister's response.

Mrs. Janet Dean (in the Chair): Dr. Brian Iddon—sorry, Dr. Evan Harris; there are too many doctors around here.

4.30 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I hate to disagree with you as soon as I rise to my feet, Mrs. Dean—it is a pleasure to welcome you to the Chair—but I should say that there are not enough doctors around. I refer of course to proper doctors, and not medical doctors such as myself. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) looks at me quizzically; proper doctors are those with PhDs, of whom there are thousands in my constituency. It is right, in the spirit of what the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) said, to make that clear from the beginning.

I wear two hats in this debate; as the Liberal Democrat Front-Bench spokesman on science and as a member of both the current Science and Technology Committee and the previous Committee, which conducted the inquiry. It was a real pleasure serving on that Committee under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Norwich—

Dr. Gibson: North.

Dr. Harris: Norwich, North; it is important to get that distinction right. In his service to the Committee, the hon. Gentleman did a huge amount to raise the profiles of the Committee and of science and technology, and I am convinced that he will continue to do so as a Member of the House. The way in which he spoke today showed the passion and expertise that he brought to bear on many of the subjects into which we inquired. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough has a hard act to follow, but with his mixture of intelligence and a mischievous sense of humour he will continue to build on the strong start that he has made and will make the Committee just as incisive and as pleasurable to serve on as it was before.

I suppose that the third hat that I, and all other hon. Members present, wear is that of a Member who is prepared to stay and debate on a Thursday afternoon near to Christmas. The fact that this is such an important subject is one reason why we are here—not just out of duty. I share the views of my hon. Friend; when I first came to serve on the Committee, I did not think that the subject was one to fill the seats. I had not heard a huge amount about the debate and was surprised that every oral evidence session had a packed gallery and that the inquiry was followed closely in the scientific and academic worlds and press. I should have realised that the stakes were high when we were subjected to a huge amount of lobbying from both sides of the argument; from the open access advocates to the publishers, as is entirely their right.

Our report struck a good balance between those two arguments. We did not fall victim to taking on trust some of the optimism and idealism of the open access campaigners. Neither would we read into the record briefings from the publishers without subjecting them to careful scrutiny. I had many heated discussions—even arguments—with publishers from my constituency and elsewhere, which were useful in helping me to clarify the key issues. One such publisher, Bob Campbell, who was mentioned by the hon. Member for Wantage, is a very clever man. I mean that as a compliment; that is not always the case in this House. He brought a dimension to the debate, even from the publishers' side, that was important.

The report was right to strike the balance that it did, and I share the concern of those who regret that it was apparently misinterpreted, to an extent, by the Government, at least in relation to the response. On reflection, I do not necessarily agree with every recommendation in the report, which failed to stress certain matters on which I will touch. This is not a party political matter, so much of what I say will represent not the position of a political party, but my reflections on the issue.

Let us be clear; when the Royal Society puts out a position statement, tens of its most eminent members write in protest and e-mails scurry backwards and forwards, we know that this is a highly contentious and controversial matter. Although one cannot guarantee this, the lack of research about the scope for an alternative model, which would work by means of encouragement and evolution, or by mandating public-funded funders of research, probably makes the correspondence and exchanges on this issue more heated. One of the Committee's recommendations was for the Government not to conduct, but to commission research on this key matter.

The Government are right that it is not a matter just for this country and that we must see ourselves in a global perspective. The National Institutes of Health has taken a lead in the United States, but the negotiations with the publishing sector, which is equally commercially minded and is, I suspect, as effective as a lobbyist as the sector in this country, were not straightforward. The NIH did not have an easy ride mandating better free access to publicly funded and NIH-funded research.

[Dr. Harris]

My first point, therefore, is that this issue is crying out for research. There is a role, if not for the Government, then for social science research funders, to look at the matter and perhaps agree the terms of reference.

My hon. Friend introduced the debate fairly and was right to stress the points that he did in respect of the report. I shall not repeat them, but I look forward to the Government's response.

On the comments of the hon. Member for Norwich, North and his appropriate praise for Emily Commander, we have probably broken all the rules in the House about not embarrassing Clerks of Committees. I shall not pursue the issue further, save by deepening the sin and agreeing wholeheartedly with what has been said.

The hon. Member for Wantage did us a service by stating clearly the publishers' perspective, and his comments deserve a great deal of scrutiny for their own sake and because they represent the view of many publishers. He is right that there are many employees of publishing companies in my constituency, which contains the headquarters of several publishers, including Reed Elsevier, Oxford University Press and many others. Many of those people—this is a general problem in the publishing world—tell me that the rates of pay in commercial publishing are not great. The work force is female-dominated, and the relatively low rates of pay in the publishing world are one reason for the continuing pay gap for female graduates. That is hard to equate with the significant profits that some organisations make. I am not criticising employers, but simply making the point that there are several issues that concern those from the publishing world, and the low pay of women, particularly women editors, is one of which I am aware. Those women object to the fact that they are in their late 20s and 30s and have to live in shared houses in a high-cost area in Oxfordshire, and the hon. Gentleman will be aware of the problem.

Mr. Vaizey: The first point is that I felt I was giving the views not only of the publishers, but of members of the academic community and learned societies. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) made it clear that a great debate is raging; it is not simply a case of the commercial publishers on one side and their opponents on the other. It is insidious to suggest that the commercial publishers are paying slave wages. There are many people on low wages in academia as well, and in many other industries.

Dr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman is right, and I did not mean to imply anything untoward. The interests of those working in publishing go far wider than the open access debate, as he will acknowledge. The same applies to science. A large number of my constituents work in that world and in libraries. They have concerns about high costs and the demands on their budgets when it comes to purchasing journals. I have heard the debates about whether the costs per article downloaded and per article bought are going up or down. However, people who work in libraries tell me that they feel that they are being squeezed. It is important to recognise that.

There is disagreement in the science world about whether open access is good or bad or something that does not matter to individuals. I shall explore that in a moment. Because commercial publishers make profits, that does not mean that they do not have a valid interest in ensuring that we have a healthy scientific publications world. The not-for-profit organisations that create surpluses that they reinvest should not claim too much of the moral high ground; they, too, have self interest. For the record, I do not consider that there is anything wrong with that, or with commercial publishers making profits out of publicly-funded research. I have greater disdain for some commercial enterprises, such as tobacco companies, and no such problem with publishing companies. There is a difference between making money by legitimate means and making money by peddling disease to developing countries. We should give a cheer for the healthy world of commercial publishing that we have in this country, led by innovative publishing organisations. The profiteering argument is not a good one.

The second point made by the hon. Gentleman concerned the argument, which he was correct to query, that because something is publicly funded, it has to be publicly available free of charge regardless of the impact that that might have on the publishing world. It is not right to be so absolute. We can say that it would be a good thing for something that is publicly funded to be widely available, and for no charge to be made for access to it. However, it does not necessarily follow that it ought to be; that would have to be balanced against the viability of the publishing model and the continuing health of the UK publishing industry. Again, I agree with the hon. Gentleman.

Where I began to depart from his point of view was on the important question of peer review. He said that an author pays model would result in journals that were less likely to be peer reviewed. Rightly, he did not say that open access or author pays means no peer review. However, it is fair to say that many in the field who promote open access and author pays are extremely sensitive about the allegation that just because the author pays model might seem to create a conflict of interest there is any evidence in established author pays, open access journals that peer review is any less strong. It is vital, as the Select Committee report made clear, that any move to open access should take with it the strongest possible element of peer review, and that a crystal clear distinction should be made between post-print, post-peer-reviewed work in institutional repositories and work that has not been peer reviewed.

Neither I, as an individual, nor my party would have any truck with anything that took away from the importance of peer review. As the hon. Member for Norwich, North wisely said, however, there are problems with peer review. It is not perfect. Sometimes it does not work. We saw the example of the Wakefield paper in The Lancet. I am pleased to say that, although The Lancet is published by Elsevier, the separation that has to exist between editorial policy and publisher did exist in that case. I do not question that. It is absolutely right to cast no blame on the publisher for the fact that the paper was published in an inadequate form—I think that some of the authors were responsible for those problems—or for the fact that it has not been fully retracted. In my view, it should have been fully retracted, but I do not think that that has anything to do with the publisher.

The same Chinese walls must exist in an open access or author pays model of publishing to ensure that there is no question of the requirements of peer review being reduced simply to attract authors, who are paying, to submit their papers. I do not think that any journal that wanted to be taken seriously and to ensure that it attracted good-quality research from responsible authors could afford, in commercial and reputational terms, to give any indication that the requirements for quality assurance were reduced in that model.

Dr. Iddon: Will the hon. Gentleman admit that this is not just a matter of producing high-quality papers? Today, it is becoming even more relevant to avoid plagiarism.

Dr. Harris: Absolutely. I say gently to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough that there is an inquiry to be had on the dangers of plagiarism, research ethics and similar problems and overall peer review issues.

Dr. Gibson: Does the hon. Gentleman think that people who peer review should be paid for doing so? They are not paid, apart from perhaps the chief of the editorial board, who has to run the whole show. Most people do it as part of their tenure.

Dr. Harris: I do not want to dodge the issue, but that is a very interesting question. There is an argument for the issue to be inquired into. I recognise—I think that the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East made this point—that there is a cost to peer review and clearly, the more filleting that has to be done because journals of high reputation attract many submissions, the higher those costs will be.

The point that I made earlier was that, in order not to transfer the cost in an author pays model on to the good researchers or the best researchers who pass peer review, journals that publish only 5 per cent. of papers received ensure that the submission fee covers the cost only of peer review. Clearly, not all journals may wish to do that, but that is what a market involves. Some will say, "We will have a submission cost." People take a gamble, but at least that means that people who are successful in getting through will not pay the costs relating to all the people who speculatively submit. I think that a submission fee is a good thing, but some journals may not want to have one in order to have that as their selling point. That is what markets do, and scientists and authors are capable of making such choices. I am in favour of choice, even in that way, in marketplaces.

Something needs to be said about the position of learned societies, because they have expressed concerns. I am aware of concerns expressed not only by the Royal Society—which has an axe to grind, not unreasonably, in respect of the journal that it produces, in effect, as a learned society—but by the Royal Society of Chemistry and others. They are concerned that a system of publishing in institutional repositories at the time when or shortly after an article is published in their journal might mean that their subscription income drops, and they rely on that income and the surplus that they get from it to do all the other good things that they do, which are so important. It is right that regard should be paid to those concerns. I believe that in a mature market, learned societies can run successful author pays systems of publishing. That means that they will have the same ability to generate surpluses that they presently have for their other activities. That is why I have concerns, which I have expressed before, about a headlong rush into the use of institutional repositories. That represents neither the straightforward publishing model that we have now, nor the full-blooded author pays access that provides an income stream for publishers, but from a different source. We must be careful not to choose one or the other.

The journals that are most vulnerable to a small drop in subscriptions will be those most liable to fold, perhaps because some people will wait to find them in a repository, especially if those facilities are linked to make them easily accessible. It is likely that the large publishers will be able to cope with that in a way that small publishers would not. I am sensitive to that matter, which is why I question whether the report has got the balance right. We must be very careful that we do not choose an option for full access if that means that no one is getting funding, no one is getting an income stream and no one is able to generate surplus.

The importance of publishing negative results has already been mentioned. That is particularly the case in the health care sector. However we deal with the question of which model to choose, we must have a publishing system that enables negative results to be published. That especially applies to clinical trials through which individuals—patients and healthy controls—have put themselves as a favour to society. Otherwise, we shall suffer from a publication bias that makes it difficult to know what the evidence base really is. We must find a way to do that, perhaps through rules that stipulate that trials must be published even if they are negative and not very interesting.

Much has been said about the developing world. The question is whether a change to an author pays system will disadvantage the developing world. As the hon. Member for Wantage said, that sector benefits from schemes organised by commercial publishers and others that are publicly funded from free or subsidised access to research findings. That is not a question of whether it is an author pays model or not. If there are to be subsidies and support for researchers and readers in the developing world, it does not necessarily matter which model is in place. Whatever the model, we must ensure support for information technology in the developing world. There must also be sufficient bandwidth for research findings to be accessed. As the hon. Member for Norwich, North said, another report of the Select Committee dealt with that matter.

In summary, this was a very important report. The Government must address any doubt as to whether they are playing with a straight bat on this matter. The Government have said that research councils—and, therefore, the RCUK—are independent of policy, even if they are in receipt of Government funding. There is concern that, because of the commercial interests of the DTI, which has a role in promoting commerce, the Government have influenced the RCUK in an effort to persuade it to reconsider or delay publications. An assurance from the Minister that that has not been the case would be extremely helpful.

The Minister will be aware that, under freedom of information, it was revealed that, since February 2004, Lord Sainsbury has twice met and had one telephone call with Sir Crispin Davis, the chief executive of Reed Elsevier. The Minister has also once met the Association of Learned and Professional Society Publishers and has once met Harold Varmus, the leading advocate of open access.

There is concern that there should be a level playing field on which people are free to lobby. People on one side of the debate have lobbied much more successfully than have people on the other, and it would be helpful if the Government reassured us that they believe there is a need for a level playing field and that they are speaking not only for those on one side of the debate but for those on the other.

A level playing field will require the Government to commission research in the way that has been described. I argue, however, that we must proceed with care so that we do not undermine the viability of one publishing model, or the viability of both models if they can live together, as I believe they can, by rushing to have institutional repository publishing without sorting out a system of kite marking and without reassuring people that it will be clear that material has been peer reviewed.

We do need to proceed with caution. The inquiry and the report were both excellent, and it was right that the Select Committee took the unusual step of drawing attention to the Government's inadequate response to the main thrust of its report.

4.56 pm

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) said in his opening remarks that he had not expected to become an expert on scientific publishing. One of the great aspects of this place is that it is a voyage of discovery in which many things come before us in which we do not expect to become experts, and we end up realising how fascinating they are and how much subject matter there is to be considered. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the very thorough and measured way in which he introduced the debate, and the very clear way in which he set out the findings of the Select Committee's report.

If anyone can make a dry subject interesting, it is the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who has the ability to bring a great sense of fun, enthusiasm and excitement to everything that he does. That will have been evident in the work of the Committee in this area and more broadly. It is notable that when he received a politics charity award for his contribution to health last week or the week before, of all the people who received awards, his was the one that brought pleasure to all parties because of the genuine respect for the expertise and excellence that he brings to his subject.

Throughout the debate, we have heard thoughtful and well-prepared speeches that presumably were written with the intention of publishing them at some time in some learned journal for future generations to read. Whether we will be prepared to pay to have them published is another subject for debate. We have all learned a great deal more.

A week ago, as I was languishing in my sick bed with scarlet fever, the thought of speaking today on scientific publications was not an immediate aid to recovery, and at times a relapse seemed almost attractive. The more that I have looked into the subject, however, the more truly fascinating I have found it to be, and it is worthy of the debate this afternoon.

We have also been taken by the fascinating undercurrent of biology v. chemistry, on which there is clearly an even greater rift between old Labour and new Labour.

Mr. Vaizey: They are both old.

Charles Hendry: As my hon. Friend pointed out, this is a UK success story. We lead the world in academic publishing. The major players in the field are British, as are the most respected journals, such as The Lancet and International Affairs. Some 5 per cent.—60,000—of the 1.2 million articles published each year are from the UK. That shows the extent to which having a vibrant publishing sector has enabled us to hit above our weight in carrying out and publishing academic research. We also have a global reputation for academic rigour.

The first question we must ask ourselves is whether the current system is failing. There are three strands to the system: the for-profit sector, the not-for-profit sector and the learned societies. Many people have spoken eloquently about the need to ensure that nothing that we do undermines the work of those learned societies.

We have ended up with a system of academic rigour that is probably second to none. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon)) spoke of Nature rejecting nine in 10 articles that are submitted to it, and 97 per cent. of the articles that are submitted to The Lancet being rejected. It should be seen as a tremendous strength that we have enormous diversity and a great range of publications, so that those at the very top are seen as being of world importance, whereas everybody at a different level still gets a chance to have their views and research published. That has led to a tremendous dissemination of knowledge.

We have to accept that excellence cannot be achieved on the cheap. It is not just the research, it is the assessment, the peer group work, the editing, the publishing and the marketing. All in all, it ends up as an extremely expensive exercise. For different publications costs of $2,000 to $3,000 per article published are not uncommon. If we want to see that excellence maintained, we must be prepared to invest in it.

Our current system has significant benefits. It means that copyright is protected. There is the legal system and the might of those publishing companies and learned societies that can protect copyright legally if that is required. The quality of the articles is maintained. The hon. Gentleman spoke of his friend the prolific writer Professor Katritzky, who has been given the opportunity to contribute so many articles and so much research in this way. Whether he would have been prepared to do that at $3,000 dollars a pop if he had been paying for it himself or his institution had been paying for it is another matter.

We have seen great strides towards interoperability and a willingness to make sure that research is shared through the use of the internet, so that people can not only access the information that has been published by that journal or by journals from the same publishing house, but can link through to other research that has been published by different publishing houses. That is a tremendous benefit for students and people carrying out research. In recent years, all back copies of publications have been scanned, so every edition of The Lancet is now available digitally for people to access. There has probably never been more research work more generally available than there is today. It is against that background that we need to decide whether fundamental reform is required.

The concept of open access is a misnomer. The concept of author pays is more accurate. My concern about going down this route—some of the issues were so well set out by my hon. Friend—is that there could be a loss of academic rigour. Some articles will simply not be submitted if authors have to pay to do it. That is an issue to which the Royal Society drew attention in its position statement on open access. It said:

"Among the potential dangers are that researchers will stop submitting papers or subscribing to existing journals, particularly if they choose only to deposit papers in repositories and archives. If many journals cease to exist, without any guarantee that open access alternatives will offer the same range of options, for instance in terms of serving all sub-disciplines, the opportunities for publishing research results might diminish."

We have discussed the needs of developing countries. The hon. Member for Norwich, North spoke about Malawi. If one went down the route of the author paying, would it open up the opportunities for people in Malawi to contribute research or would it, as I believe, start to close them down because they and their institutions would find that they simply could not pay the charges? There is another dimension to this. As the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East said, it is not the author who pays but the institutions behind him or her. What we will then see is the potential for abuse because of the people who are prepared to fund publication.

Before I came to the House I worked, I am almost ashamed to say, in the public relations industry. It used to amaze me how many people could be found to write an academic research paper on virtually everything saying, for example "Fat is good for you," "Smoke is good for you," "More butter is important," "More alcohol is vital" and so on. Someone could be found, funded quite often by an organisation or a company with a vested interest in that area, to produce a piece of doubtless well researched academic work that came to the conclusions that they wanted.

If we go down the author pays route, we will open up the possibility that the people who are prepared to fund publication because of commercial advantage will come that much more to the fore. We have to question whether under that principle the same rigour would be given to choosing articles based on their academic merit. If a publication is trying to fill the final article or two before it goes to print, and it has an article with a cheque for $3,000 attached, it may be prepared to relax its standards. The Royal Society drew attention to that. It said:

"One consequence might be that the primary criterion for publication of results may become whether they are produced by researchers who can pay, rather than whether they are of wide interest to the rest of the research community. A move towards a system that relies mainly on ability to pay rather than quality would profoundly undermine the exchange of knowledge."

We have also discussed peer review. If there is a conflict between funding and the quality of the publication, the concept of peer review is inevitably undermined to some extent. It is also possible that we could end up subsidising large corporations. I believe that 40 per cent. of the subscriptions to publications are from large corporations—companies such as GlaxoSmithKline and Ford. Do we really want the research to be available free to major corporations, which can afford to pay for it, yet charge the academic institutions and academics who provided the work in the first place? I am not even persuaded that that is a sustainable direction. The German company Springer has decided to offer choice, saying that people can go down the author pays route or the traditional way. Of some 200,000 articles published by Springer last year, only 24 were submitted on the author pays basis. Although I applaud and encourage diversity, we can see that there is no tremendous enthusiasm in the research community for going down that route.

The hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Evan Harris) spoke about charging for submissions in order to stop people putting forward too many articles. That fills me with horror. It strikes me as an attack on inspiration at a time when we should be encouraging people to submit the best research that they can to the best publications available. We should not start taxing people and putting charges on their work because they have dared to aim higher than might seem appropriate.

The hon. Member for Norwich, North introduced the concept that because the state has paid for it, the research should be accessible to all. That sounds like a wonderful motherhood and apple pie concept, but it would cause some fundamental problems. It would be a massive extension of state involvement. Do we really want a sector that has worked so well to be run as efficiently as the Child Support Agency or the working family tax credit system?

When the Government start to become involved in such matters, particularly if complicated computer systems and research engines are required, they do not necessarily do it as well as those in the private and the not-for-profit sectors. There would be no measure of quality. The temptation would be to publish everything; the concept of peer review would again be undermined.

Dr. Gibson: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that people who want things published do not want rubbish to be published because it creates problems, with people criticising their work? The community has some self-discipline, with papers being assessed by friends, who discuss where it might go before they get to the peer review system. The hon. Gentleman underestimates the fact that people in this field want to ensure that their work is of good quality, otherwise their kudos and respect plummets. They want a paper published so that people can say, "That was interesting work. Will you come and address a meeting?" The self-discipline of the community is hard to measure.

Charles Hendry: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I understand what he says. The most effective measure of peer review is people examining the work and then asking whether others would be prepared to pay for it. When people come to decide whether to renew a subscription, they must be certain that they are getting the most thorough and best-quality research. The present system is rather better at guaranteeing that at the highest level.

We talk about the costs of funding research, but we have not taken account of the significant additional costs of publishing, marketing and bringing the research to wider attention. Unless the state is prepared to fund all that—that would represent a major extension of its funding in this area—we need to think carefully about taking that approach. The market is generally working well, choice is growing and new people are entering the market with new approaches, as we have heard. We do not, therefore, need to consider fundamental root-and-branch reform.

I would be grateful if the Minister could pick up on the issue of VAT on digital publications, which a few hon. Members have mentioned. The Government expect to make VAT gains from such publications over time because more will be done digitally than on a paper basis. As a result, the area that has been VAT exempt will decline and the area that is subject to VAT will grow. It is worrying that the Government should look to make money out of this, and I hope that the Minister can give us some reassurances on the issue.

We have heard that profits in the sector are high. However, the overall cost to universities of the present arrangements remains low—at one half of 1 per cent. of their total budget.

The best way to end is to quote again from the Royal Society's publication and its conclusions. The Royal Society ends by saying:

"Careful forethought, informed by proper investigation of the costs and benefits, is required before introducing new models that amount to the biggest change in the way that knowledge is exchanged since the invention of the peer-reviewed scientific journal 340 years ago. Otherwise the exchange of knowledge could be severely disrupted, and researchers and wider society will suffer the resulting consequences."

We are all committed to maintaining that exchange: it is a beacon of excellence and the hallmark of the research that has been carried out in this country and propagated throughout the world. I hope that the Minister can answer some of the many points that have been raised in the debate.

5.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): This afternoon has taken me back 25 years or more to a seminar on the philosophy of science, which I attended not as a scientist, but as a philosopher. The speaker was going to expostulate on quantum physics and explained that it was highly unlikely that we would be able to maintain our concentration throughout the afternoon, because the two people he would be telling us most about were called Plank and Bore. We have not had Plank or Bore this afternoon and we have managed to maintain our concentration throughout. However, whatever conclusions the House or the Government reach on whether the author should pay to publish, this afternoon has taught us one thing. Given that we have had three hours of debate, even though few hon. Members have spoken, politicians should perhaps pay to speak; that might keep speeches a little shorter.

The Government's position on open access is that research funding authorities should have the discretion to provide the funds if the author prefers an open access route. The Government's aim is to allow the market to develop without institutional barriers being put in the way of any particular publishing model. As we made clear in our response to the Science and Technology Committee, we are happy to see publishers developing several business models, including subscriber pays, open access and hybrid approaches. That option will encourage competition and innovation in the publishing industry and in publishing models, as well as retaining freedom of choice for authors. It is in the long-term interest of a sustainable scientific publications market.

I must congratulate the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), who now chairs the Select Committee. He laid down several challenges and made several interesting points, to which I shall try to respond in my remarks. In particular, he said that it was essential for the Government to take the lead in funding and setting up open access because it would never get off the ground if they did not. I find it extremely refreshing to find a Liberal adopting such good old-fashioned socialist, centralist policies.

The Committee's inquiry was valuable. It highlighted an important area for discussion, which is the need to ensure that as wide an audience as possible can avail itself of the results of publicly funded research. The debate also threw up the fact that there is a complicated range of interrelated issues for which no one solution is likely to be ideal. The Government must take that into account when they develop their policy on scientific publications. The issues that the Government must tackle include the archiving of electronic material, because we must ensure that digital material is preserved for future generations; quality assurance, for which peer review is vital; and value for money. Most press interest has centred on what is commonly referred to as open access publication.

Publication of science is a key part of the scientific process. At present, with the dominant business model, a subscription payment is required, usually from a university or institutional library or from the commercial and industrial sectors, which the Committee acknowledged in "Scientific Publications: Free for all?"

"contribute significant funds to the publishing process".

However, is that the most cost-effective, or fairest, way to distribute scientific knowledge? An alternative model, which is known as open access, requires the author to pay to publish an article in a scientific journal. In practice, however, the institution or a research council would probably pay, not the author. The article would then be free to view on the internet.

There has been much debate about the current subscription model. Hon. Members have spoken about the perceived dominance of publishers and about diminishing library budgets. Proponents of the current subscription model argue that open access would ensure that scientific publications would be available to all as soon as they were published. That would be useful for people who are on career breaks, for example. However, opponents argue that many journals already provide such access and that the current open access business models are unproven and unsustainable.

The Government's position on open access is that we need to ensure, as we have heard from many quarters, a level playing field in order that research funding authorities can have the discretion to provide the funds if the author prefers an open access route. Given the uncertainty with current business models, that position is the most appropriate in order to encourage competition and innovation in publishing models and to retain freedom of choice for authors.

It was not only instructive but enlightening—as is usual with my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North—to find that this debate came about as a result of a bar-side chat that he had with Lord Eatwell that focused on the unsupportable cost of scientific journals. There was, however, a lacuna somewhere in the argument that was made that publishing journals and learned societies were charging too much. The other assertion that my hon. Friend made was that the reason that the Government did not want to go down the open access route was because it would cost more.

While on some points that my hon. Friend made, I shall challenge one calumny that he may have perpetrated on the Royal Society of Chemistry, albeit unwittingly. Hansard will show that he considered the RSC's position to be that poor countries did not wish to be patronised by the RSC making available its information free of charge. In fact, the RSC does make its information available free of charge but considers that developing countries' scientists may not wish to be patronised by having author fees waived in an author pays system. That was conveyed to me before this debate. Scientists in developing countries would want to have their work received on merit and on an equal basis. Although the UK's research budget may be able to pay for authors in this country, as the hon. Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) remarked, it may be much more difficult for a scientist in Malawi, or in another developing country, to receive the same support.

Mr. Willis: Does the Minister accept that an important part of overseas development aid might be to do exactly what Research Councils UK or other organisations do in the UK? They underpin the author pays model as part of their development aid project. Would that not be an excellent way of bringing together science and development in one pot?

Barry Gardiner: I fear that I am being led into a system of Copernican epicycles, whereby we try to correct the problem by using ever more remote systems in order to right the original wrong.

Dr. Evan Harris: The Minister was right to try to clarify the position of the Royal Society of Chemistry, but it would be wrong to argue what developing world scientists might think without asking them and doing some research. Such scientists, rightly, already receive help to attend conferences and the problem of how to fund author pays will apply to those who are not funded by wealthy people or countries. That might also apply, as has been said, to charities in this country. They would probably be willing to accept payment or help in kind in terms of author pays fees. We cannot assume that they would not.

Barry Gardiner: I do not wish to challenge the hon. Gentleman. I sought to clarify what I understood to be the position of the Royal Society of Chemistry, rather than to develop any of his points further.

Let me return to publications. The Government need to consider a number of important issues with regard to scientific publications. Hon. Members will be aware that different disciplines, ranging from social sciences to astrophysics, have different needs, so a one-size solution would not necessarily fit all. We have to take into account the specific needs of many very different disciplines when formulating policy. Much has been said about the vital issue of peer review. Researchers need to be confident that the article that they are reading has been vigorously and rigorously peer reviewed, whatever the business model might be. Peer review is crucial for quality control, whether in print format or in an electronic journal, whether using open access or traditional subscription approaches.

It is imperative that the quality of research articles be maintained and not compromised by financial considerations or hasty changes to business models. As has been said, the leading journals have significant rejection rates, and it is that that drives up the quality of the articles. If a non-scientist may be allowed to introduce a classical note into the debate, "Male verum examinat omnis corruptus judex". Horace's point was that a poor way to establish the truth was to pay the judge.

For the benefit of research as a whole, a clear distinction must be made between those articles that have been published after rigorous peer review and those that have not. A key requirement of any published article is that it should be absolutely clear to researchers which version they are looking at. There must be no room for ambiguity. Journal impact and research assessment exercise is a key determinant of where an author publishes. The current RAE position in some disciplines, whereby journal impact is used when considering quality, could deter authors from publishing in open-access journals that are not established.

Dr. Harris: On the same basis, does the Minister accept that there would be no market for any journal that had a reputation for not doing adequate peer review in an open access model, because it would have no credibility? Nobody would want to publish there if there were any question that quality assurance was not high. That is how the market would work under that system. People do not buy cars that break down.

Barry Gardiner: The hon. Gentleman has a low estimation of how desperate some people are to get in to print. In the Government's view, flexible copyright arrangements form part of the basis of competitiveness on which publishers market their journals. Publishers, both commercial and not for profit, use flexible copyright arrangements to compete for the services of authors. Model licences are available through trade associations representing the scientific, technological and medical sector, including the Association of Learned and Professional Society Publishers, which represents the not-for-profit sector, and the Publishers Association, which represents commercial publishers.

In 2004, trade associations covering both commercial and non-commercial publishers jointly drafted a statement of practices and principles relating to the publication of primary research supported by public funding within a learned journal. The Government welcome such efforts by publishers to identify a consistent approach to copyright agreements.

As we stated in our response to the Select Committee, we believe that the data underpinning the results of publicly funded research should be made available as widely and rapidly as possible along with the results. We also acknowledge that effective research depends upon researchers having access to the results and findings of their colleagues in the research community. We have no difficulty with that in principle.

The archiving and preservation of scientific information for future generations is important. The Government recognise the potential benefits of institutional repositories and see them as a significant development worthy of encouragement, but they believe that each institution has to make its own decision about institutional repositories depending on its circumstances. Institutional repositories and journals need to run in parallel to ensure that rigorous peer review of research findings is not compromised. Peer review is crucial for quality control, whether in print or electronic format, and whether using the author pays or subscription approach.

Mr. Willis: If the Minister is saying that the Government are happy for there to be individual institutional repositories or organisations that have them, will he explain what he will do to encourage those to speak to one another? I think that he would accept that having silos throughout the country that do not speak to one another seems rather a foolish way to move forward. The Committee's report said that in setting up these repositories, it was important that the Government should encourage the repositories to speak together—not fund or organise them, nor become a monopoly provider. What will the Minister do to encourage that, if he supports the idea of individual repositories?

Barry Gardiner: I will be addressing those points.

As I have said, the archiving and preservation of scientific information for future generations is critical. The legal deposit system in the UK is one of the key means of achieving that, and deposit libraries such as the British Library have a vital part to play. The rapid rise of digital publishing has shown how important it is that the deposit system can respond to new forms of publishing. The Government have recognised that through the Legal Deposit Libraries Act 2003, which will allow us to regulate for the legal deposit of different forms of non-print material.

We are making good progress. The Legal Deposit Advisory Panel was established in September and is expected to make it first recommendations to the Government early next year. It is important to remember that the introduction of digital legal deposit is primarily about the creation and preservation of a national archive for future generations, not about widening access. Deposited material in any form will be available only to people physically present in a deposit library in order to protect the interests of publishers.

There has been much debate on the merits of open access, which has often produced contradictory views. Criticism has been aimed at the Government that they are too preoccupied with supporting publishers to the detriment of the research process, and also that they are unwilling to support the open access or author pays model because it will reduce revenues for publishing companies. That is simply not the case. The Government are looking to get the best sustainable system to communicate information from researchers to those interested in the research. The Government should be supporting the best and most cost-effective way possible to disseminate the outputs of scientific research, and at the moment there is insufficient evidence that the author pays model is the better system.

A successful and sustainable scientific publications market is vital to the research process, and to strongly endorse or reject the author pays approach would not be in the interests of allowing the market to evolve to meet the needs of authors. The Government have not decided against the author pays model but do not want to force a premature transition to a different system. It is not obvious that the author pays business model will give better value for money than the current one, and the Government have said that they will require clear evidence, on the basis of current trials, before supporting it further.

In the Government's view it is too early to make judgments about the viability of the author pays model. There are already a number of author pays journals, but in many cases the costs of open-access publishing models still are not clear and transparent. There is also the significant issue of how to address the shortfall in revenue that would be caused by widespread transition to the author pays model. As I said, the commercial and industrial sectors contribute a substantial amount of money to the publishing process by subscribing to journals, but that would be lost if the publishing process moved to an author pays system. I thank the Committee for acknowledging that key issue in its report and for highlighting that there is currently no solution to that problem.

The estimated cost of producing an article can vary as much as from £300 to £2,500, taking into account several factors, such as the number of articles rejected. Those figures are likely to change as the market develops. The true cost of any STM publication needs to include the costs of capital investment requirements, peer group evaluation, formatting, linking, and the profiling and archiving of information. A number of open-access journals are currently being published, but the robustness of the business models is still unclear, with many initiatives relying on public funding or charitable contributions. So far, we have seen no convincing evidence that the author pays model would be cheaper to operate than traditional publishing models.

It is clear that the Government need to take into account financial and business considerations in this debate. Publishing is an international business; the majority of revenue from STM publishing comes from exports rather than UK sales. Current estimates are that the global market for STM publishing and information services grew by 7 per cent. from £4.97 billion in 2003 to £5.31 billion in 2004. The UK is a major contributor to the provision of STM publications, and the UK STM journal market alone is worth £129 million. It is therefore important not to put the UK at a financial disadvantage internationally. Of course, that consideration needs to be balanced with the needs of the UK research community.

The interests of the research community, the taxpayer and the publishing industry, whether commercial or not-for-profit firms, are closely intertwined. The continuation of widely disseminated, accessible, top-quality, peer-reviewed research that is produced efficiently and at competitive prices is in everyone's interests. There is a wide diversity of products and publishers in the STM market. Authors can choose to have their research published free of charge by a particular publisher or journal, taking into account factors such as the prestige and reach of a publication. The Government believe that it is right to allow authors to make that choice.

It is also important that revenue is generated to finance developments in new technologies that will benefit the whole scientific community. It is only through the profits generated from current products that publishers and learned societies can afford to develop new technologies that will benefit the whole of the academic community. The Government will continue to encourage the publishing community to develop its products to meet the needs of that community. The STM segment of professional publishing was one of the early adopters of internet-based technologies and business models. Substantial investments over a number of years have facilitated the migration of revenue streams from traditional channels to e-commerce. It is not yet fully clear how the open-access model with a one-off payment for publication would generate sufficient revenue to finance the high investment needed in relation to producing new technologies.

I turn to the issue of VAT, which was raised by several hon. Members. The issue of differential treatment of print and digital publications for tax purposes was raised in the Committee's report. As the Government said in its response to the Committee:

"The DTI, DCMS and Customs and Excise have discussed the VAT treatment of digital publications on a number of occasions. Customs are aware of the concerns expressed in submissions to the Select Committee's inquiry. However, the removal of VAT on digital publications is not possible. Under long standing European agreements the UK can retain its existing zero rates but cannot extend them or introduce any new ones. This is the case for all Member States that retain VAT zero rate derogations. There is no realistic prospect of the Commission proposing, or all other Member States agreeing to, any change in that position. The only way to equalise the VAT treatment of print and digital publications would be to levy VAT on printed publications. The Government is committed to retaining the zero rate of VAT on books and newspapers.

The EU list of permitted VAT reduced rates (Annex H of the Sixth VAT Directive) does not include digital publications. A review of the reduced rate provisions is currently underway, but the prospects for significant agreed change presently remain remote and the Government is not persuaded of the case for the inclusion of digital publications on the list. Whereas printed matter is clearly well defined, e-publications are closely related to a wide range of material that is capable of being downloaded, including films, music and software. The current rules for determining in which Member State VAT is due on digital publications, and their mode of delivery also makes them inappropriate for inclusion in the list of permitted reduced rates. This is because the VAT is paid to the Member State where the publisher is legally established rather than where they are purchased.

It is not possible, under long-standing agreements with our European partners to exempt or zero-rate supplies of digital publications to libraries. Libraries are liable to pay VAT on many goods and services that they purchase in the same way as any other purchaser. The normal VAT rules do, however, allow institutions that are undertaking taxable business activities to recover the VAT they incur. In addition, local authorities are refunded the VAT incurred on goods and services (including digital publications) purchased in connection with their statutory public duties, including the provision of public library services. This refund scheme is achieved by section 33 of the VAT Act 1994, and is designed to ensure that VAT does not become a cost borne by local taxation.

Where VAT is not recoverable under section 33 or the normal VAT rules, it is established practice that publicly funded institutions should reflect this irrecoverable VAT in their bids for funding."

Dr. Iddon: Does my hon. Friend the Minister accept that it is difficult to establish a level playing field between e-publishing and currently acceptable publishing, which is what the Government say that they want?

Barry Gardiner: Of course I recognise the discrepancy between the two modes of publishing and the VAT levied on each. That is an unassailable fact.

I know that some will argue that some publishers are making too much profit at the expense of the taxpayer. Normal profits are necessary to lead to a healthy level of investment, for example in new technology and value-added services. Journal pricing should reflect the costs of ongoing capital investment, production—including peer review—editorial issues, marketing and administration, and the level of demand. If there is evidence that financially powerful scientific, technical and medical publishers are using their strength to increase prices or make excessive profits, that would be a matter for investigation by the Office of Fair Trading.

In arriving at the position that I have outlined, I would like to emphasise the important part that cross-Government working has played. The Government did not arrive at this position alone and, as I have already stated, at every step of the way, the Office of Science and Technology collaborated with colleagues in business relations in the Department of Trade and Industry, Research Councils UK, the Higher Education Funding Council, the Department for Education and Skills, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for International Development to provide a response to the Select Committee report. There was constant consultation, discussion and all views were taken into account. Government officials have met a wide range of stakeholders to develop our thinking about the Government response and policy.

Hon. Members will no doubt be aware of the particular criticism levelled by the Committee last year that the OST exerted undue pressure on the Joint

[Barry Gardiner]

Information Systems Committee to seek to neutralise its views. I would like to take this opportunity to repeat that that was not the case. The OST worked closely with both the JISC and the RCUK.

The Government have been extremely proactive in the scientific communications area. We have been continually reviewing our policy based on the limited evidence that is available, and Ministers and officials have engaged with a wide range of stakeholders, including those at European level.

In describing the Government's view, I hope that I have made it clear that the Government do not favour one part of the value chain over another. We have in our sights the long-term interests of a sustainable UK publications market. We are happy to speak to all elements of the community, whether they be publishers, funding bodies or academics, to promote an understanding of each other's needs.

Hon. Members will be familiar with the RCUK's position. However, I will recap the main features because our perceived attitude to that matter has attracted much attention and created some misunderstanding and because the issue is germane to the debate. The position is based on four principles. First, ideas and knowledge derived from publicly funded research must be made available and accessible for public use, interrogation and scrutiny, as widely, rapidly and effectively as practicable. Secondly, effective mechanisms must be in place to ensure that published research outputs are subject to rigorous quality assurance through peer review. Thirdly, the models and mechanisms for publication and access to research results must be both efficient and cost effective in the use of public funds. Lastly, the outputs from current and future research must be preserved and remain accessible not only for the next few years, but for future generations.

The RCUK developed its position statement in consultation with stakeholders and submitted it to the Government. The RCUK was encouraged to disseminate information widely and received many constructive comments. A further consultation exercise was undertaken, which closed at the end of August. The RCUK is working closely with all interested parties to examine all concerns and endeavour to clarify and refine its position.

When the Government responded to the Select Committee report, we said that we would take into account any points raised in the EU study. The Government await with interest the publication of that paper, and officials are in contact with the Commission. The DTI will continue to promote dialogue on this important matter at a European level.

In conclusion, the issue of open access requires much more debate. The DTI is encouraging that debate by facilitating the work of the research communications forum, where funding bodies, libraries and the publishing industry can meet regularly to exchange views and develop a better understanding of one another's needs and views.

Mr. Willis: As there are four minutes remaining, could I ask the Minister to respond to my earlier question about what the Government are doing to link individual repositories? If the RCUK agrees to support author pays with grants, will the Government support that?

Barry Gardiner: I did not catch the second part of the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Mr. Willis: If the RCUK agrees, as part of its next funding round, to support author pays with grants, will the Government support that?

Barry Gardiner: I am not in any position to start writing blank cheques. However, if the RCUK were to arrive at that position, the Government would have to consider that very seriously. We would examine and assess that matter at the appropriate time. As for joining up repositories, I shall not fall prey to any manoeuvring. The Government are addressing that issue by engaging in the debate, facilitating the research communications forum and examining what can be done. That is not a commitment to ensure that the hon. Gentleman gets what he wants.

I confirm that the Government's position on open access is that we must secure a level playing field so that research funding authorities have the discretion to provide funds if the author prefers an open access route. That position is the most appropriate to encourage competition and innovation in publishing models and retain freedom of choice for authors. We will continue to meet stakeholders from all parts of the industry, and we will keep our position under review. Finally, may I congratulate the Committee—

It being sixteen minutes to Six o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.
